'However smart your business strategy is in theory, it will have little effect if you fail to carry it out. Corporate politics, personalities and turf wars, and misunderstood intentions and silo thinking combined with changing circumstances result in the strategic focus becoming dimmed or distorted. And this loss of focus is rarely noticed because few companies track performance against long-term plans. Drawing on original research, this book outlines the ways in which organisations are carrying out their strategy more effectively by : clearly identifying priorities; considering the deployment of resources well in advance; monitoring performance continuously;

breaking strategy down into easily achieved objectives; intensive team-based coaching that ensures everyone understands their role and priorities; fostering a risk-friendly culture that encourages freedom of action if it supports key strategic goals.'

CLIMATIC CHANGES

'Anxieties over global and national energy, water, and climate security are growing. Oil and gas are at record prices, and global energy demand is increasing. Water availability is dwindling from aquifer overpumping and contamination. Water needs to be better managed to feed a growing global population. Climate change is exacerbating the impacts of the overuse of our planet's resources. This book examines the powerful interconnections that link energy, water, climate, and population and explores available options to address these issues jointly. It clearly demonstrates the need for urgent action. If not addressed immediately, this complex set of interlinked issues now confronting humanity may put the very future of civilization at risk. Difficult decisions and major reforms in resource governance, policies, and use are needed to ensure worldwide energy, water, and climate security. Only a strong and courageous global leadership can promote appropriate policies and help prevent unpleasant surprises. This book provides basic introductory material to begin understanding and combating these issues.'

redefine culture, offers new information on the topic of occupational cultures, and demonstrates the crucial role leaders play in successfully applying the principles of culture to achieve organizational goals. He also tackles the complex questions of how an existing culture can be changed - one of the toughest challenges of leadership. The result is a vital resource for understanding and practicing organizational effectiveness.'

'The privatization of defense assets and the outsourcing of military services from the armed forces to the private sector is an increasing trend. This book approaches the issue of military privatization by linking it to the transformation of the defense industries that has occurred since the early 1990s, and shows the extent to which many military functions and activities, ranging from military research to military consulting/training to operational support services, have already been outsourced in the US and in Europe. This detailed study provides new and updated information on the ongoing privatization of the defense sector and offers an original theoretical explanation as to why the most modern armed forces throughout the world have come increasingly to rely on private companies for nearly everything they do. Contributing to a better understanding of military privatization and its close connection to technological change, this book explains the complexity of the whole phenomenon and discusses its implications for national and international security. It is argued that the use of more complex technology by the armed forces not only increases their dependence on the private sector, but also that it facilitates military globalization and proliferation. As more armed forces around the world are aiming at a similar vision of a 'transformation' to high-tech militaries, the present trend of military privatization is bound to become more pervasive in the future. Many of the problems and dilemmas that military privatization causes, however, remain unaddressed and unsolved.'

DEFENSE TRANSFORMATION--USA

'Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld arrived at the Pentagon in 2001 with an agenda that included the transformation of the American armed forces. His intent was to modernize the existing force, while simultaneously developing high-tech innovations to revolutionize the military of the future. The primary architect of transformation, Vice Admiral Arthur K. Cebrowski, USN (Ret.), conceived what is known as network-centric warfare - a concept designed to leverage advances in military technology that will influence the US Armed Forces for many decades to come.'

Military Transformation Past and Present : Historical Lessons for the 21st Century / by Mark David, 1950- Mandeles. - Westport, CT : Praeger Security International, 2007.

Bibliography: p. 131-152. Includes index.

'Transformation has become a buzzword in today's military, but what are its historical precursors - these large-scale changes that were once called Revolution in Military Affairs (RMA) ? Who has gotten it right, and who has not ? The Department of Defense must learn from history. Most studies of innovation focus on the actions, choices, and problems faced by individuals in a particular organization. Few place these individuals and organizations within the complex context where they operate. Yet, it is this very context that is a powerful determinant of how actions are conceived, examined, and implemented, and of how errors are identified and corrected. The historical cases that the author examines reveal how different military services organized to learn, accumulate, and retrieve knowledge; and how their particular organization affected everything from the equipment they acquired to the quality of doctrine and concepts used in combat. It is characteristic of 20th century military history that no senior civilian or military leader suggested a policy to handle overlapping responsibilities by multiple departments. Today's policymakers have not learned this lesson. In the present time, while a great deal of thought is devoted to proper organizational design and the numbers of persons required to perform necessary functions, there is still no overarching framework guiding these designs.'

'Bringing together her own field interviews, documentary material, and secondary sources, the author critically assesses the recent history of international interventions and criminal prosecutions. She examines three cases in detail - Cambodia, Rwanda, and the former Yugoslavia in its current forms of Bosnia and Serbia - considering their international context prior to and during internal wars and arguing that each case has to be understood in its own context and history. There is no common pattern and no easy fix that can mend broken societies after wars.'

'Over recent years, security and intelligence issues have been pushed to the forefront of global political debate to an unprecedented degree. Books on all aspects of intelligence have been released, but significant gaps remain. One important gap lies in the absence of an authoritative and comparative look at national approaches to security and intelligence and the resulting impact on international cooperation. This two-volume work provides chapters on national cultures of security and intelligence, which address common questions and themes. The countries chosen for coverage are representative or significant to given regions, with authors covering strategic environment, regime type, accountability, impact of 9/11, international cooperation, and national cultures of intelligence. While concerned with national approaches, the volumes also recognize and analyze developments in international intelligence cooperation. The authors address the extent of cooperation with other national security and intelligence agencies and consider special relationships where they exist. Each volume contains a separate chapter on developments in the internationalization of intelligence.'

'Why are some regions prone to war while others remain at peace ? What conditions cause regions to move from peace to war and vice versa ? This book offers a novel theoretical explanation for the differences in levels of and transitions between war and peace. The author distinguishes between 'hot' and 'cold' outcomes, depending on intensity of the war or the peace, and then uses three key concepts (state, nation, and the international system) to argue that it is the specific balance between states and nations in different regions that determines the hot or warm outcomes : the lower the balance, the higher the war proneness of the region, while the higher the balance, the warmer the peace. The international systemic factors, for their part, affect only the cold outcomes of cold war and cold peace. The theory of regional war and peace developed in this book is examined through case studies of the post-1945 Middle East, the Balkans and South America in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and post-1945 Western Europe. It uses comparative data from all regions and concludes by proposing ideas on how to promote peace in war-torn regions.'

'There is no shortage of literature addressing the workings, influence, and importance of NATO and the Warsaw Pact individually or how the two blocs faced off during the decades of the Cold War. However, little has been written about the various intrabloc tensions that plagued both alliances during that period or about how these tensions affected the alliances' operations. The essays in this book seek to address that glaring gap in the historiography through a wide range of case studies that explore these often-significant tensions, dispelling in the process all thoughts that the alliances always operated smoothly and without internal dissent.'

'NATO is at a crucial point in its development : on the one hand, the European members are seeking to redefine its mission as the security challenges have radically changed since 1990. Another thorny issue is the security responsibilities of the member states. At the same time, there are nine central and eastern European nations which are seeking an invitation to join NATO. There are general guidelines for evaluating nations seeking NATO membership; however, these guidelines are not a checklist that, when completed, would automatically guarantee membership. NATO members decide on the basis of consensus whether the admission of a state will serve the interests of the Alliance and promote European security and stability.'

What are the implications of different cultures in international negotiations ? What characterizes a durable solution ? Empirical examples illustrate theoretical conceptions.'

'Why have nuclear weapons not been used since Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945 ? The author disputes the conventional answer of 'deterrence' in favor of what she calls a nuclear taboo - a widespread inhibition on using nuclear weapons - which has arisen in global politics. Drawing on newly released archival sources, she traces the rise of the nuclear taboo, the forces that produced it, and its influence, particularly on US leaders. She analyzes four critical instances where US leaders considered using nuclear weapons (Japan 1945, the Korean War, the Vietnam War, and the Gulf War 1991) and examines how the nuclear taboo has repeatedly dissuaded US and other world leaders from resorting to these 'ultimate weapons'. Through a systematic analysis, the author challenges conventional conceptions of deterrence and offers a compelling argument on the moral bases of nuclear restraint as well as an important insight into how nuclear war can be avoided in the future.'

'True urgency is a gut-level determination to move and win, now. Its practitioners are unusually alert. They come to work each day determined to achieve something important, and they shed irrelevant activities to move faster and smarter. Those with a sense of true urgency are the opposite of complacent - but they are not stressed-out and anxious, generating great activity without much productivity. Instead, they move boldly toward the future - sharply on the lookout for the hazards and the opportunities that change brings. The author shows what a true sense of urgency really is, why it is becoming an exceptionally important asset, and how you can create and sustain it within your organization - starting today.'

'When Vladimir Putin came to power in 2000, George Bush said he was a man he could trust. Since then, relations between Russia and the West have gone from bad to worse. The EU and Russia have been unable to agree on the terms of their partnership; NATO expansion continues apace, threatening to include countries like Ukraine and Georgia; the United Kingdom harbours as political refugees men who call for the violent overthrow of the Russian government; and the United States is determined to build an anti-missile shield which, Moscow fears, would render feasible a 'first strike' against Russia. How do Russians see these developments and the other developments inside their fascinating country ? This volume contains articles by some fifty commentators and decision-makers, the overwhelming majority Russians, on issues as diverse as immigration, demography, the economy, gas and oil pipelines, foreign policy, public opinion and international relations. The book aims to provide a survey of all the major political and social issues facing Russia today.'

'Rather than simply view it as a zone of stability, US and European policy makers ought to see the Nordic/Baltic region as a microcosm of Europe's post-Cold War security problems. The difficulties found there - from traditional hard security threats to more amorphous challenges such as organized crime and environmental degradation - are representative of Europe's key security issues in the post-Cold War era. Precisely for this reason, the Nordic-Baltic zone provides an important laboratory for exploring possible solutions to security concerns that confound Europe as a whole, with the added benefit of being able to do so absent any immediate hot crises. Whether it is a question of stabilizing US and Alliance relations with Russia, adapting and enlarging Europe's primary security institutions, or restructuring military forces to meet the new challenges to Euro-Atlantic stability, what happens in the Nordic-Baltic region over the next several years can serve as a predictor for whether all of Europe will see peace and stability, the return of a cold war, or ongoing bouts of instability culminating in small but deadly wars on its periphery. The authors set forth a detailed examination of the new strategic dynamics at work in the Nordic-Baltic region and provide in-depth assessments of the security perspectives held by states bordering the Baltic Sea. The authors then examine current US strategy toward the region and propose next steps for US policy, including, most importantly, a policy for Baltic membership in NATO.'

'This volume provides an in-depth analysis of security governance in and across all the states of West Africa. Emphasis is placed on how the security sector is configured, assessing issues of operational efficiency, civil management and oversight of this most sensitive area of public policy. Although the focus of this volume is largely on analyses of specific national contexts, local, national and regional processes are closely interrelated. In particular, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) has a vital role to play in supporting security sector reform within a framework of democratic security sector governance.'

Bibliography: p. 158-163. Includes index.
'The author discusses here the concept of warriors and war, covering warrior culture from ancient Greece to the Iraq War, taking in philosophy, psychology, political thought, culture and news media. In modern Western society, warriors face three different challenges. The first is that the warrior myth, as embodied by Achilles, no longer holds as great a resonance as it once did. Western societies are increasingly sceptical of the warrior's existential pursuit of glory or reputation, and, more worryingly, the willingness to sacrifice oneself, to go beyond the call of duty. Warriors are also struggling with the increasingly technological basis of war. Not only is the warrior becoming distinctly out of sorts with society's post-modern sensibilities, but the future battlefield environment is becoming an unforgiving one. In concluding, the author argues that, even though it has declined, the warrior ethos which has emerged in the Western world over the centuries is as important as ever before, that warriors do still exist and that the warrior code remains essential for psychological, humanitarian and political reasons. He also makes a clear statement of why those who target civilians instead of other soldiers do not qualify as 'warriors'. Finally, the author analyses the problems within our culture that prevent us from valuing warriors, and argues that this culture is flawed, and that warriors are a special group who provide morality in war.'

'Television is a medium of terror. Stories and images of mostly distant violence and bloodshed are streamed continuously into our homes, penetrating our senses of personal and collective safety. And yet the journalism of terror is also the journalism of security. Television, as it delivers daily the spectre of endless terror and violence, also rescues us from the brink of chaos. The unimaginable is rendered familiar and terror is harnessed in the frames, rituals, and routines of the major medium of our age. The authors demonstrate the power of the entanglement of television and terror in both the spinning and the containing of the discourses of insecurity that mark our mediatised experience of the twenty-first century.'

'This work explores how, after a long period of isolation, Turkey is becoming a major player in Middle Eastern politics once again. In fact, by acting independently and attempting to reconcile its constitutionally secular form of governance and vibrant traditional culture, it is now for the first time becoming positively viewed by others in the Muslim world as a state worth watching - and maybe even emulating. As a result, Turkey's dynamic political scene and new search for independence in its foreign policy, however complicating or irritating for the United States today, will nonetheless ultimately serve the best interests of Turkey, the Middle East, and even the West.'

'Dans une société toujours plus médiatisée, mais où la politique étrangère n'a pas toujours suscité de la part du public ou des médias l'intérêt qu'elle aurait mérité, les écoles de pensée, think tanks, lobbies et autres groupes d'intérêts ont souvent été à même d'exercer l'influence que pouvaient leur assurer, dans les deux premiers cas, leur prestige et leur autorité ou, dans les deux derniers, leur vote, leur appui financier mais aussi les alliances qu'ils ont très vite apprises à nouer. À tel point, constate un des auteurs de ce volume, que l'on peut concevoir les États-Unis comme une 'démocratie des intérêts spéciaux' exposée au danger de voir émerger une 'tyrannie de la minorité'. Il est vrai que, pour les Américains, la notion d'intérêt national reste très différente de celle qu'en ont les Français : loin de constituer une sorte de réalité transcendante supérieure à la somme des intérêts privés, elle s'identifie tout au contraire à la résultante fatalement provisoire et fragile de ces derniers. Dès lors, il n'est pas facile de comprendre les tenants et aboutissants de l'élaboration de la politique étrangère américaine si l'on ignore les différends entre isolationnistes, internationalistes, libéraux, neo-conservateurs et adeptes de la Realpolitik, si l'on ne tient pas compte de l'activisme des grands lobbies économiques ou si l'on fait abstraction du poids des groupes représentatifs soit de certaines organisations humanitaires ou idéologiques, soit des principales communautés ethniques.'

The situation is precarious. Securing Afghanistan will require not just military but also political and economic measures.

ARMS CONTROL AND DISARMAMENT--USA

Challenging conventional thinking is rarely popular, even or perhaps especially when it is most needed. So it has been with the Bush administration's approach to arms control and nonproliferation issues. Determined to develop new approaches in arms control, nonproliferation, and strategic policy to deal with the new realities of a post-Cold war era, the administration found itself under fire from those determined to uphold traditional and often outmoded ways of thinking about these matters. Many of its critics doubtless now look forward to the Bush administration's departure.

Principles in the Pipeline : Managing Transatlantic Values and Interests in Central Asia / by Alexander Cooley., 2008.

After a decade of relative neglect post-Soviet Central Asia has become a foreign policy priority for the transatlantic community. Both the United States and Europe have engaged with the region in recent years in pursuit of new strategy interests, including maintaining military basing access in support of coalition operations in Afghanistan and securing the export of Central Asian oil and gas to the West. Despite this period of renewed engagement, however, the quality of democratic governance within the region remains poor, especially in comparison with other post-communist regions that successfully completed their political transitions. In fact, the United States and the European Union have often tempered promoting their Central Asian democratization agendas in order to maintain access to these strategically important fixed assets. The transatlantic struggle to balance the pursuit of strategic interests and democratic values has been rendered more difficult by Russia's recent resurgence as a regional power. Backed by the Central Asian governments, Moscow has challenged the purpose and influence of western-based international and non-governmental organizations in the region, thereby further diminishing the transatlantic community's capacity to promote sustained democratic reforms.

In this essay, China's involvement in Africa is examined, including China's main objectives, and the prospects and implications for Africa's development. Also analyzed are the changes that African countries must implement in order to enable them to leverage China's involvement to enhance their development. Whether Chinese interests and involvement bring the danger of renewed exploitation without development or lead to sustainable progress depends on the extent to which Africa is able to take advantage of the opportunities of China's growing interest to address the many social, cultural, economic, and political pitfalls that challenge the African continent.

In the late 1960s, border skirmishes between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China led to speculation that a war between the two countries was possible. In 2001, however, a settlement over their long-disputed border reflected increasing and wide-ranging cooperation between Russia and China. Examples of this cooperation included sales of Russian military equipment, technology, and raw materials to China; joint military maneuvers; and common diplomatic initiatives. However, there are signs that the current closeness between Moscow and Beijing could be transient. Although the relationship is currently strong, the forces that brought Russia and China together are ebbing, and the future of their relationship is uncertain.

The purpose of this article is to contribute to a better understanding of the contemporary importance for democracy of the relationship between elected leaders and the security forces. It attempts to present a conceptualization and framework to help comprehend what security forces actually do and how they interface with democratic governments. The article aims to extend the conceptual breadth of the literature on civil- military relations beyond control to include two further dimensions - effectiveness and efficiency. The research is based on the authors' experience in conducting programmes for officers and civilians throughout the world in line with at least six different roles and missions of security forces. The conceptualization draws on literature in comparative politics, organization theory, and defence economics, as well as civil-military relations, and security sector reform.

A new climate is likely at the United Nations climate change conference in Poland early this month and not just because of the election of Barack Obama as President of the United States. The international financial crisis has highlighted the cost of poor policies and the scale of banking bailouts has made dealing with climate change seem less formidable. Besides, such schemes could create new jobs and give an edge to the competitive economies of tomorrow.

There have been a number of nuclear non-proliferation successes (Germany, Iraq, Taiwan, Argentina, Brazil, South Africa, Libya, Syria) and failures (USSR, France, China, India, Pakistan, probably Israel, North Korea 'DPRK'), and at least one potential proliferator (Iran) whose future is uncertain. The successes are heterogeneous : some resulted from direct military or paramilitary action, while others followed changes in the political situation that removed the strategic rationale for the willingness to pay the economic and political price of proliferation. The failures have in common a proliferator that perceived a compelling strategic need for nuclear weapons. Such countries resist outside pressures, and may reap the benefits of proliferation even if their weapons are untested. The author considers the relevance of a Comprehensive Nuclear Ban Treaty to proliferation in light of this history.

The downturn in relations between the UK and the U.S. under the premiership of Gordon Brown presents an interesting opportunity to analyse the nature of the relationship between the two states. Brown's policy of creating distance between his approach and that of his predecessor, Tony Blair, and between himself and President Bush, offers a case-study in whether it is possible to be cool towards an incumbent leader while remaining close to the state he leads. In other words : is it feasible to be anti-Bush and pro-American ? It also provides an opportunity to analyse the role of political timing in inter-state relations. By appearing driven by reaction to the events of 2003 despite taking office in 2007, Brown put himself out of step with the prevailing mood of the time. By also acting as if the Bush administration was a lame duck counting out its time to retirement in 2009, Brown allowed himself to be outmanoeuvred in his bid for America's attention by the conciliatory pro-American new leaders of France and Germany. By acting as if the Bush administration is a political interregnum, the Brown government has invited the United States to treat his own administration the same way. The result is a dual interregnum in UK-U.S. relations, with each incumbent leader awaiting the political demise of the other before better relations can be resumed.

Cyberspace may be physically, syntactically and semantically identified. But the cyberwar is more difficult to define, as it seems to adopt rather classical conceptions. Even though a big bang sending us far from the IT age remains a remote possibility, we nonetheless have to work out operational plans making use of cyberspace elements. Co-operation with the private sector is essential to achieve such an aim.

He reminds readers that as of July 2008, The New Way Forward (Surge Strategy) is coming to an end. The author believes the Iraqi government and its security forces have achieved many of the benchmarks and objectives outlined in that particular strategy. He warns that the real challenge is to get the drawdown of US military forces right. How should the United States configure its forces for future military operations in Iraq? The author concludes with some broad recommendations for this new strategy.

The Ahtisaari comprehensive proposal for a settlement of the status of Kosovo met with deadlock in the UN Security Council. It would neither be endorsed nor imposed upon the parties. In view of that position, a new round of negotiations, conducted by the EU, Russia and the U.S., was launched over a period of 120 days. During these discussions, Serbia's President Boris Tadic revealed a significant measure of flexibility when putting forward options for wide-ranging self-government for Kosovo. However, these forward-looking positions were undermined by a less advanced proposal emanating from other parts of the Belgrade government, including the Prime Minister. Moreover, the Serbian parliament sought to preempt developments by unilaterally adopting its own constitutional amendments relating to Kosovo, further undermining the credibility of Serbia's position at the international level. However, it could be argued that had Belgrade been willing to begin the previous round of negotiations led by Martti Ahtisaari with the advanced offers it was putting at the very end of the process, a different outcome might have resulted. Such action might have put pressure on western governments to impose an advanced autonomy settlement on Kosovo, rather than putting Belgrade under pressure to accept the Ahtisaari plan. In the end, Kosovo's independence was unilateral in two senses. On the one hand, Kosovo declared independence without the benefit of agreement from Belgrade or cover from the UN Security Council. On the other hand, Kosovo unilaterally accepted provisions emanating from the Ahtisaari talks. These concessions had been made in the expectation that agreed independence would be forthcoming in return. Belgrade was therefore able to oppose independence and work against its consolidation, while profiting from Kosovo's agreement to the plan it had rejected.

The Kurds are an ancient Indo-European people who are different from any of the neighbouring nations. Their language is quite distinct from Arabic. For the past 80 years or more, Iraq's centralized system of control has failed to accommodate the Kurds who live inside the borders of Iraq, and the author believes that federalism within the Iraqi state will fail to satisfy the desire for self-rule. The author argues that the ultimate goal of the Iraqi Kurds is independence and is apparent from the system they have developed within their region. The nature of Iraq's divided multi-ethnic society constantly results in ethnic tensions, and the reality is that the Kurds are a nation with strong feelings of their distinct identity, and those that live inside the borders of Iraq resent being forced to live as a subordinate minority in a state dominated by Arabs.

This article examines the lack of mass mobilization by Iraqi Kurds to establish an independent Kurdistan. It argues that while the outcome of an unofficial January 2005 referendum - in which 98% of Kurds supported independence - was a clear expression of their will, the political opportunity structures within which the Kurdistan Referendum Movement operates are closed to the formation of a mass-based social movement. Utilizing data from a survey of Kurdish elites and activists, as well as follow-up interviews, this analysis provides insights into the future of democracy in Iraq and the value of political opportunity theory in understanding mass mobilization.

The Israeli leaders had declared that global military threat was over, and then focused on military operations aiming only to maintain the public order by means of targeted attacks in the occupied territories. Doing so, they trapped themselves, together with Tsahal, in a powerless strategy in the war triggered in 2006 against Hezbollah. But Israel was neither politically nor morally ready to this confrontation, and even less from a strategic standpoint. This is a lesson that other Western armies should think over.

Mongolia is a large country, thinly inhabited, endowed with large mineral resources. It has succeeded rather smoothly a democratic

By testing for structural breaks in defense expenditures, the dates of change in the pattern of defense expenditures for the NATO allies are determined. If NATO members are responding to a common threat, the breaks should be similar, in both directions and dates, for defense expenditures. The breaks should occur during major NATO strategy shifts. The results of the structural analysis tests suggest that NATO allies do not have an integrated response to NATO-specific defence issues. It appears that NATO members, in general, adjusted their defense spending according to economic imperatives, political issues, and ally-specific defense agendas.

Since the collapse of the USSR, NATO/Russia relationship is based on a long lasting misunderstanding. Yeltsin, as well as Putin, tried to establish close links with NATO and secondly, to co-operate in practical terms. The Russians consider that NATO has never taken seriously its demands for a partnership. The Russia/NATO relationship must be rebuilt from the start. Given the current challenges, it is necessary and even possible.

Russia and America have a special responsibility to connect 'vertical' nuclear disarmament and 'horizontal' nonproliferation. Russian and American behavior will influence the choices made by nonnuclear states about the decision for a nuclear weapons capability or for the acquisition of a complete nuclear fuel cycle with the potential for weaponization. This study uses an analytical model to examine the stability of a possible future world in which nonproliferation efforts 'hold the line' against new nuclear states, while the U.S. and Russia maintain stable deterrence at reduced levels of deployed forces.

The article investigates the risks associated with the increased use of nuclear energy to offset world dependence on fossil fuels. He bases his thesis on an examination of the form this expanded use of nuclear energy might take what this increase will mean for the distribution of materials and technology; and the accompanying threats to security. The author believes that any substantial increase in the use of nuclear energy to offset shortfalls in fossil fuels will, by the middle of this century, possibly tax the nonproliferation regime's surveillance and enforcement mechanisms beyond the breaking point.

Like any other international agreement, the NPT includes a withdrawal clause. North Korean withdrawal, which was announced in 1993 and became effective in 2003, shows how difficult it is to preserve this possibility, while guaranteeing compliance with signed agreements. To achieve this target, two conditions are required : first, enhancing the means by which the reasons for withdrawals can be made clear and second, to allow the Security Council to draw all the consequences of withdrawals that could imply that a treaty has been violated.

In September 2008 India signed a co-operation agreement on civil nuclear energy with the United States. In so doing, it got rid of an embargo that lasted for several decades, due to India's refusal to sign the NPT. This agreement has triggered many political debates in India and in the United States as well. Though the treaty is part of a new general design of the Indian diplomacy, it is very likely that it does not mean that New Delhi has radically changed its views on Washington.

The Bush administration has undermined the network of nonproliferation treaties, controls and security arrangements central to global stability. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in September that the Bush administration will leave the proliferation 'situation...in far better shape than we found it.' If only this were true. Instead, Bush officials leave office like financiers fleeing busted Wall Street banks, with precious assets squandered on risky ventures, once-solid institutions crumbling, surpluses turned into gaping deficits, and a string of problems mismanaged into crises that threaten to bring down a decades-old global regime.

Iran is an existential threat to Israel. President George W. Bush even warned that Iran's declared intention of destroying Israel could lead to World War III.

After the withdrawal of Western experts, Russia took over the building of nuclear plants, without clearly explaining what it really intended to do. Nowadays Iran has no international assistance, either to complete the nuclear plants, or to achieve full control of the nuclear combustion cycle. Going forward seems difficult, even though Iran has proved capable to mobilize a good deal of energy to attain its target.

Strategic culture is an amalgam of a country's set of shared beliefs, assumptions, and narratives that shape its strategic decision-making process. This article evaluates Iran's evident pursuit of nuclear weapons in light of four key elements of its strategic culture as an attempt to ascertain Iran's goals for developing these weapons. These four elements include : (1) an all-encompassing conviction in Shia Islam as the bedrock of the regime's political legitimacy and the country's national identity; (2) a hypernationalistic belief in Iran's rightful place as he leader of the Islamic civilisation and as a regional hegemon; (3) a pervasive sense of external and internal vulnerability; and (4) an ingrained perception that the U.S. desires to dominate and eventually destroy the Islamic civilization. The evaluation of these elements strongly augurs that a nuclear-armed Iran is not likely to employ these weapons offensively due to its fear of retaliation and the constraining interests within its regime's political structure. Rather, its drive toward a nuclear-weapons capability is to provide Iran with a defensive deterrent that will advance its desires for regional hegemony and mitigate its pervasive sense of insecurity.

Nuclear weapons and strategic strike capability are the highest priority of the Russian Federation. Russia is deploying both advanced new strategic nuclear delivery vehicles and new types of nuclear weapons. Russian military leaders have openly stated that Russia has deliberately lowered the nuclear use threshold and talk about the use of nuclear weapons in regional and local wars. This is attributed to weakness in conventional forces. However, a number of respected Russian military analysts argue that the real motive is to increase political clout against the United States and NATO. Russia has formally adopted a nuclear escalation doctrine in which the introduction of nuclear weapons into a conventional conflict is characterized as 'deescalation' of the conflict. Unlike NATO's 'flexible response' doctrine of the 1960s - the nearest parallel to current Russian thinking - there is a dangerous assumption that the use of few nuclear weapons will end a conflict with a Russian victory. Failure to view Russia realistically could endanger U.S. national security in the future.

The article provides readers with an in-depth analysis of the missions currently performed by contractors, insight as to how the role of contractors has evolved, and recommendations for the future employment of contractor personnel. The author bases his assessment on three guiding principles : that the majority of jobs currently performed by contractors should not be done by military personnel; provisions for bodyguards (where most problems have occurred) have viable options for change; and the restructuring (downsizing) of the military following the Cold War makes the use of contractors a necessity, not an option.

The author attempts to place the deaths of more than 1,350 contractor personnel in Afghanistan and Iraq into a context that equates these fatalities to those of military personnel. The author believes the average American does not fully appreciate the human cost associated with contractor fatalities and injuries. He asserts that neither the public nor the Congress can understand or influence US involvement in such conflicts without first knowing the level of the military's reliance on contractor personnel in the war zone. The author concludes his analysis with the declaration that the US government has increasingly delegated to the private sector both the right and responsibility to stand in harm's way, and if necessary, die for the country (acts previously restricted to the military profession).

This article explores the potential of the responsibility to protect, having gained the support of the member states of the United Nations (UN) at the 2005 World Summit, as a framework for the UN to address genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. It is argued that in order for the UN to harness this potential of the responsibility to protect a number of obstacles and challenges - normative, institutional and operational - must be overcome and that international human rights law has a central, if not pivotal, role in this regard thereby strengthening the responsibility to protect as a framework for the UN to address genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity.

Traditional state v state war is largely a relic. How then does a nation-state defend itself, pre-emptively, against an unseen enemy? Existing international law - the Caroline Doctrine, UN Charter Article 51, Security Council resolution 1368 and 1373 - does not provide sufficiently clear guidelines regarding when a state may take pre-emptive or anticipatory action against a non-state actor. This article proposes rearticulating international law to allow a state to act earlier provided sufficient intelligence is available. After examining international law, this article proposes a process-based 'strict scrutiny' approach to self-defence. Under this approach, the executive will have to convince a court, based on relevant, reliable, viable and corroborated intelligence, that pre-emptive action is appropriate. This process leads to a check on the power of the executive by placing a judicial check on pre-emptive action, consequently establishing legal criteria for operational counterterrorism.

Beyond being a bilateral challenge, the conflict between Moscow and Tbilisi has deeply modified the political landscape in South Caucasus. Relations between Armenia and Azerbaijan are probably now more reliant on Russia. The triangle Moscow/Ankara/Teheran is enhanced, while the American presence is fading off. The author closes with the warning that pursuing such a policy would avoid the difficult apportionment choices required in today's volatile and uncertain world.

The author develops a thesis based on the belief that the United States is a superpower in search of a grand strategy. Readers will be struck by the author's assertion that this philosophical void is having a detrimental impact on the structure and purpose of the US military. He warns against America's pursuit of its current strategy of 'US hegemony' or the suggested alternatives of 'neoisolationism' and 'offshore balancing'. He advocates a 'concert-balance' strategy that does not require America to be the sole counter to the world's aggressors, relying instead on a concert or alliance of nations. Inherent in this new strategy is the rejection of the principles of dissuasion and reassurance as unilateral missions for the United States. The author concludes with a description of the missions America's military may require to undertake in the execution of a concert-balance strategy.

For the last two decades the U.S. has pursued what some analysts have called the 'fantastical idea' of military transformation that would enable the U.S. to change the very nature of war. Known as the 'revolution in military affairs', this process would use technology to provide the U.S. with battlefield dominance that no opponent could overcome. Motivated by the politics of the Cold War, however, this exit from reality has proved less than effective in what has become known as the 'war on terror'. The U.S. has been pulled into nasty, 'small' wars, against enemies utilizing asymmetric tactics. The Bush administration has tried to destroy these groups through the use of military force, failing, or even worse refusing to recognize that these enemies feed off the economical, political and social rot of weak and failing states. For the last eight years the U.S. government has addressed the symptoms of a problem rather than the actual disease. If America wants to make serious progress with the most pressing national security risks, the next American president must enact a revolution in foreign affairs that sees a massive overhaul and substantial investment in the State Department and USAID. A critical mass of research exists to illustrate the links between development and security - it is time Washington gets serious and embraces a conception of security that is more holistic, and ultimately, more effective.

After eight years of misguided Middle East policy from President George Bush's administration, an enlightened strategy to tackle the region's plight is overdue. This must include an approach that will bring change to an area consumed by conflict and division and filled with disdain toward the United States. Although the massive economic crisis facing America is and should be President-elect Barack Obama's first priority, he must not hesitate to confront the simmering conflicts in the Middle East that cannot be relegated to the back burner without severely undermining the strategic interest and security of the US.

America's policy of framing its war against extremists as a 'War on Terrorism' has resulted in an erroneous paradigm for countering terrorism and insurgencies. Not only does this policy mischaracterize the enemy, it obscures an understanding of their techniques and impedes the development and implementation of a strategy to counter the acts of these enemies. The author outlines a number of steps the United States should take to refocus its strategic frame of reference to more effectively address remediating symptoms and the deeper causes associated with such threats. He calls for clear thinking supported by clear language ; characterized by removing the phrase 'war on terrorism' from the official lexicon and replacing it with more precise and descriptive terms. It is this clear articulation of this strategy that will allow for the integration of all the elements of national power in the effective prosecution of America's national security objectives.
