'Post 9/11 the USA developed a policy of 'war on terror' and as part of this the decision was made to democratize the Middle East with a controversial policy of pre-emptive invasions in both Afghanistan and Iraq. This volume seeks to analyze and investigate to what extent this policy was justified or effective. It looks at the evidence of democracy post-invasion and also considers the global, regional and internal politics leading up to the decision to invade. It attempts to answer the questions most troubling the international community since the invasion of Iraq, such as: Were the invasion of Iraq and Afghanistan an exploitation of military supremacy to secure a favourable balance of power for the USA? Is it possible to build a stable democracy after a pre-emptive invasion? What is the current outlook for a stable democracy in Iraq?'

'In the post-Cold War and post-9/11 era, nation-building, or what is increasingly termed state-building, has taken on renewed salience, making it more important than ever to set the idea and practice of nation-building in historical perspective. This volume focuses on the history of nation-building during the era of decolonization and the Cold War and on the more recent post-Cold War and post-9/11 pursuit of nation-building in what have become known as 'collapsed', 'collapsing', 'failed' or 'failing' states. Focusing on both historical and contemporary examples the contributors explore a number of important themes that relate to 'successful' and 'unsuccessful' nation-building efforts from South Vietnam in the 1950s and 1960s to East Timor, Afghanistan and Iraq in the 21st century.'

In December 1995, the Dayton Agreements ended the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina and established a fragile peace between the former conflict parties. The Agreements were widely regarded as both a blessing and a curse from the very beginning. Bosnia and Herzegovina had been subjected to an armed campaign characterized by ethnic cleansing and genocide and the Dayton settlement seemed to freeze the situation on the ground to the benefit of those who had conducted the armed campaign against the Bosnian state and imposed such tremendous suffering on its population. The settlement seemed morally wrong and politically impracticable, but still necessary in order to end violence of a scale and intensity not seen in Europe since the end of the Second World War. Against this background, the expert contributors to this volume analyse various dimensions on the internationalised state-building process in Bosnia and Herzegovina since 1995 and conclude that internationalised state-building can thus only serve well in the stabilisation of states emerging from conflict if it draws on a well-balanced approach of consociational techniques, moderated by integrative policies, tempered by a wider regional outlook and sustained by resourceful and skilled international involvement. The experience of Bosnia and Herzegovina may not have scored full marks in all of these categories, but even, and perhaps especially where the internationalised state-building effort has lacked in effective policies, important lessons can be gleaned for other similar contemporary and future challenges that the international community no doubt will have to face.'

This book investigates modern peace-keeping missions, and reveals how to build a country out of the ruins of civil war. Not two missions are the same, but there are already lessons enough to build on. This is a vital task that affects us all. 'Failed states' are simply too dangerous to be left alone, yet we cannot afford interventions that fail on such a massive scale as they have in Iraq. It is no good winning the war only to face a bloody insurrection by the very people the operation was intended to help.'

'Given resumed Taliban power and attacks, Afghanistan must tackle a host of serious problems before it can emerge as a confident, independent nation. Security in this battered state continues to deteriorate; suicide bombings, convoy ambushes, and insurgent attacks are still all too common. Effective state building depends upon eliminating the national security crisis and enhancing the rule of law. This book offers a blueprint for moving the embattled nation toward greater democracy and prosperity.'

'This volume brings together a group of essays on all phases of the Iraq War : both US-led major combat operations to defeat the Ba'athist regime as well as efforts to reconstruct the country and defeat the insurgency. The chapters were written by some of the leading scholars on the Iraq War, many of whom have practical first-hand experience. It is also the first work on the Iraq War to incorporate an understanding of the Iraqi side, based on a systematic analysis of captured Iraqi archives.'

'This study brings together internationally renowned academics to provide a detailed insight into the theory and practice of state-building. State-building is one of the dominant themes in contemporary international relations. This text addresses both the theoretical logic behind state-building and key practical manifestations of this phenomenon. Unlike 'how-to' manuals that seek to identify best practice, this book interrogates the normative assumptions inherent in this practice and the manner in which state-building impacts on contemporary international relations. The logic of state-building is explored and analysed providing insight into the historical context that catalysed this process, the relationship between international law and the practice of international administration and the political ramifications and implications of external governance. Case studies on Bosnia, Kosovo and East Timor provide practical examples of key contradictions within the state-building process, highlighting the lack of accountability, democracy and vision manifest in these operations.'

'By the middle of 2007, Afghans had become increasingly disillusioned with a state-building process that had failed to deliver the peace dividend that they were promised. For many Afghans, the most noticeable change in their lives since the fall of the Taliban has been an acute deterioration in security conditions. Whether it is predatory warlords, the Taliban-led insurgency, the burgeoning narcotics trade or general criminality, the threats to the security and stability of Afghanistan are manifold. The response to those threats, both in terms of the international military intervention and the donor-supported process to rebuild the security architecture of the Afghan state, known as security-sector reform (SSR), has been largely insufficient to address the task at hand. NATO has struggled to find the troops and equipment it requires to complete its Afghan mission and the SSR process, from its outset, has been severely under-resourced and poorly directed. Compounding these problems, rampant corruption and factionalism in the Afghan government, particularly in the security institutions, have served as major impediments to reform and a driver of insecurity. This paper charts the evolution of the security environment in Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban, assessing both the causes of insecurity and the responses to them. Through this analysis, it offers some suggestions on how to tackle Afghanistan's growing security crisis.'

Notes:
The Dayton Accords ended the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1995. The 10th anniversary gives reason to investigate the post-war period, today's realities and future perspectives. Authors from Bosnia and international experts express their views on recent developments. Insiders and outsiders, working in the conflict and on its transformation, have been invited to tackle the questions: which conflict lines mark the present society? Did peacebuilding activities address the underlying causes? What are obstacles for conflict transformation? What are the potentials and limits of international support? What does 'civil society' mean in Bosnia and how is it related to statebuilding and democratisation? How can people constructively deal with the past in order to design the future in the region of former Yugoslavia?'

'Having endured a generation of devastating conflict under Saddam Hussein and in the chaos following his overthrow in 2003, Iraq may now be gearing up for another generation of violence. The potential consequences for Iraq, the region, and the world are incalculable. What drives this conflict? Where do the sources of this ongoing instability lie? What options do Iraqis have to bring stability to their country? What levers does the international community have to help them? These are the questions this volume seeks to address.

Conflict and Peace Building in Divided Societies: Responses to Ethnic Violence - Abingdon, UK: Routledge.

'This book provides an integrated account of ethnic, nationality and sectarian conflicts in the contemporary world, the causes of civil war and insurgencies. It explains how collective myths and threat propaganda promote violence and block conciliation, shows the dilemmas of counterinsurgency in the Occupied Territories, Balkan wars, Afghanistan, Iraq, highlights the shortcomings of humanitarian intervention and showcases peace negotiations and their implementation. The author analyzes peace building through constitutional design; power sharing governance; disarming combatants, post-accord security and refugee return; transitional justice; economic and social reconstruction in a multiethnic society. In addition to many examples from the last two decades, the author provides a comprehensive overview of the conflict and peace processes for Bosnia, Northern Ireland, and Israel-Palestinians. He argues that insurgency creates contentious issues over and above the original root causes of the conflict, that the internal divisions within the adversaries trigger conflicts that jeopardize peace processes, and that security and rebuilding a failed state are a precondition for lasting peace and a democratic polity.'

'Intergovernmental organisations (IGOs) play a crucial role in security sector reform and governance (SSR/G). In virtually all instances of recent and current SSR programme delivery, IGOs have either led the SSR effort or supported the lead provided by other actors. How this role is played is of vital importance for the prospects of fostering durable security and development in a wide range of countries. This volume looks at a selection of organisations that have been in the forefront of SSR activity or that have the potential for significantly developing their SSR agendas in the future. It is divided into four parts: conceptual issues; case studies on how IGOs have approached SSR in programme areas that are particularly representative of their overall action; case studies on the way various actors, primarily but not exclusively IGOs, have worked with each other in implementing SSR and supporting its implementation; and conclusions drawn from the various case studies as well as policy recommendations for future IGO work in the area of SSR/G.'

'This book is about the relationship between societies and their security forces at times of great political and societal change. It uses the experiences of Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro to examine the control, management and reform of armed forces, police and intelligence agencies in the aftermath of conflict and authoritarianism. In doing it addresses two underlying questions. First, how and in what ways does reform in the security sector interrelate with processes of domestic political and societal transformation, particularly democratisation. Second, how and in what ways do these processes relate and respond to internationally-driven efforts to promote a particular type of security sector reform as a component of wider peacebuilding and democracy promotion strategies.'

'Stabilization and reconstruction operations in Afghanistan have been overshadowed by developments in Iraq since the 2003 invasion. This overshadowing detracts from the achievements in Afghanistan since 2001, including the completion of the benchmarks in the Bonn Agreement, which has given Afghanistan a constitutional framework and nascent political institutions. However, much hard work remains before these institutions can be considered mature. Moreover, the security situation has deteriorated significantly, and long-term stability in Afghanistan remains elusive. This report analyzes the challenges Afghanistan faces, including sensitive issues not addressed in the compact, and proposes measures to meet them. By delineating tasks in the areas of security, governance, reconstruction, and regional cooperation that still require significant attention and resources, this report makes an important contribution to our understanding of what should be done in a country whose importance has for too long and too often been underestimated.'

'This memoir of fourteen months as America's proconsul in Iraq is the only senior insider's perspective on the crucial period following the collapse of Saddam Hussein's regime. Bremer describes negotiations with emerging Iraqi leaders as they struggle to forge the democratic institutions vital to Iraq's future; his resistance to the cut-and-run policy that would have quickly delivered governance of Iraq to a handful of unrepresentative anti-Saddam exiles; heated sessions among members of America's National Security Council; his frustration with intelligence operations that concentrated on the search for weapons of mass destruction while the insurgency gathered strength; the selfless and courageous work of thousands of American servicemen and -women and civilians; and working with Iraq's traumatized and divided population to find a path to a responsible government.'

'When the US led the invasion of Iraq in March 2003, it expected to be able to establish a prosperous liberal democracy with an open economy that would serve as a key ally in the region. It sought to engage Iraqi society in ways that would defeat any challenge to that state-building project and US guidance of it. The authors argue that state-building in Iraq has been crippled less by pre-existing weaknesses in the Iraqi state, Iraqi sectarian divisions or US policy mistakes than by the fact that the US has attempted - with only limited success - to control the parameters and outcome of that process. They explain that the very nature of US state building in Iraq has created incentives for unregulated local power struggles and patron-client relations. Corruption, smuggling and violence have resulted. The main legacy of the US-led occupation, the authors contend, is that Iraq has become a fragmented state - that is, one in which actors dispute where overall political authority lies and in which there are no agreed procedures for resolving such disputes. As long as this is the case, the authority of the state will remain limited. Technocratic mechanisms such as training schemes for officials, political fixes such as elections and coercive tools of repression will not be able to overcome this situation. Placing the occupation within the context of regional, global and US politics, the authors demonstrate how the politics of co-option, coercion and economic change have transformed the lives and allegiances of the Iraqi population. As uncertainty about the future of Iraq persists, this volume provides a much-needed analysis of the deeper forces which give meaning to the daily events in Iraq.'

Kosovo Between War and Peace: Nationalism, Peacebuilding and International Trusteeship - Abingdon, UK: Routledge.

Peacebuilding and reconstruction of war-torn societies have increasingly taken the shape of de facto trusteeship arrangements, with the ongoing administration of Kosovo being the primary example. This book examines the obstacles to reconciliation and social reconstruction in Kosovo, and discusses the potential and problems of the revived trusteeship institution. Bringing together international scholars, the book presents the latest empirical knowledge alongside detailed theoretical analysis. After a re-examination of the background factors that continue to hamper the attempt to administrate and reconstruct the society of Kosovo, primarily the nationalist ideologies and the still growing record of ethnic violence, the book analyses the key challenges local parties and the international community have encountered in the country including the ones associated with the reconstruction of local governance, the educational system and the economic sector as well as the question of Kosovo's status. More generally, the volume asks whether the revived international trusteeship institution is the way forward for international society when faced with reconstruction challenges of the scale of Kosovo, Bosnia, East Timor, Afghanistan and Iraq. In this perspective, it discusses the underlying liberal aspirations as well as the ramifications of the increasing securitization, militarization and great-power domination of international trusteeship arrangements indicated by the examples of Afghanistan and Iraq. Fundamental questions concerning the relationship between trusteeship and sovereignty, national self-determination and the potential of world organization are raised as well.'

'This book provides an overview of the costs, benefits, consequences, and prospects for rebuilding nations emerging from violent conflict. The rationale for this comes from the growing realization that, in the post-Cold War era and in the aftermath of 9-11, our understanding of conflict and conflict resolution has to include consideration of the conditions conducive to sustaining the peace in nations torn by civil war or interstate conflict. First, whereas wars between sovereign nations had dominated international politics for the previous 300 years, civil wars within nations - revolutions, secessionist wars, ethnic conflicts, and terrorism - have become the most frequent and deadly forms of armed conflict since the end of World War II. Second, the Third World - Asia, Africa, Latin America, and the Middle East - has become the site of most of the armed conflict in the last half century. Third, not only has civil war become the dominant conflict modality in the international community but once it occurs in a nation, it is highly likely to recur at some time in the future. Fourth, while the end of the Cold War has not significantly diminished the frequency and destructiveness of war, the international community has compiled an unprecedented record of mediating peaceful settlements to a number of protracted conflicts in the Third World. These trends define a new agenda for the international community in the new century:
how do we sustain the peace in nations previously torn by civil war? Each of the chapters here analyzes the prospects for building a sustainable peace from a number of different perspectives, examining: the role of economic development, democratization, respect for human rights, the potential for renewal of conflict, the United Nations, and other critical topics. In an age when 'nation-building' is once again on the international agenda, and scholars as well as policymakers realize both the tremendous costs and benefits in fostering developed, democratic, peaceful and secure nations, the time has truly come for a book that integrates all the facets of this important subject.'
States, and what will be, in the next decade, the most pressing challenges confronting the Organization? Will the United Nations, in its current form and within the new global power structure, be able to remain relevant, retain its ideals and still respond meaningfully to mounting international tensions? These were some of the questions tackled by a group of eminent scholars and practitioners, many directly and personally involved with multilateral or unilateral peace operations.'

The author argues here that UN peacekeeping operations that are to build peace once a peace agreement has been signed do contribute to durable peace. He concludes that even in the worst case - the failure of Rwanda - there was a contribution, albeit a contribution that was far too small and only temporary in nature. By analysing the UN peacekeeping operations in Cambodia, Mozambique, Rwanda and El Salvador in a structured, focused comparison, this book shows how UN operations do have a contribution to make. To conclude, the book formulates a number of factors for success and failure. What is most important is that the conflicting parties are willing and sincere, that they have the impression that their security is sufficiently well safeguarded, and that the UN peacekeeping operation pays sufficient attention to the actual causes of the conflict.'

Most peace accords reached in civil wars over the past decade have resulted in extremely dysfunctional peace: a grudging and exhausted hiatus in conflict rather than a process that results in sustainable peace and reconciliation between antagonistic groups. Despite the local and international peace-support energy expended in Bosnia, Israel-Palestine, Cambodia, Northern Ireland, Democratic Republic of Congo and elsewhere, the quality of peace experienced by citizens in post-war locations is often appalling. This book adopts a critical perspective to investigate the stalled, tense and fragile peace that often follows orthodox peace processes and peace accords supported by the international community. It identifies the 'liberal democratic peace' as the increasingly standardised version of peace promoted by leading states, international organisations and international financial institutions. Based on extensive observations in societies emerging from civil wars, this book offers guidance on a rejuvenation and reorientation of stalled and dysfunctional peace accords.'

'This book looks at why it is so difficult to create 'the rule of law' in post-conflict societies such as Iraq and Afghanistan and offers critical insights into how policymakers and field-workers can improve future rule of law efforts. Aimed at policymakers, field-workers, journalists, and students trying to make sense of the international community's problems in Iraq and elsewhere, this book shows how a narrow focus on building institutions such as courts and legislatures misses the more complex political and cultural issues that affect societal commitment to the values associated with the rule of law. The authors place the rule of law in context, showing the interconnectedness between the rule of law and other post-conflict priorities, from reestablishing security to revitalizing civil society. The authors outline a pragmatic, synergistic approach to the rule of law that promises to reinvigorate debates about transitions to democracy and post-conflict reconstruction.'

Through an assessment of the complex relationship between media and the security sector in the country, the openness of the security sector itself is taken into account. The ultimate aim of this study is to evaluate the pace to a good governance of the security sector for BiH.'

'The transition from interventionist (military) peace-keeping to local (civilian) ownership of public security management has proved not only to be a severe challenge for most peace-keeping operations and their civilian administrators, but also a reason for such operations being prolonged at tremendous cost. In many cases, peace-keeping operations and/or other international agents rapidly became part of the local economy, and thus contributed to the preservation of the status quo rather than to a sustainable process leading toward local governance; meanwhile local police organs - often remnants of the winning force in the antecedent conflict - remained tribal or clannish in their approaches and interests. They could thus hardly be seen as enforcement agencies of a law which remains equally applied to all citizens. What seems to be needed instead of the scenario described above is a democratically overseen, systematic and cumulative process which involves confidence-building, legal, cultural (values) and institutional elements; each of which may need to be interpreted differently at different stages of the process: from utter local alienation from existing security structures to functional local ownership of public security management.'

'This integrative discussion of the multiple dimensions of peacebuilding in postconflict societies offers a systematic approach to strategies and processes for long-term social, political, and economic transformation. The author links short-term crisis-intervention efforts to a sustained process that encompasses the entire complex environment of a conflict. His broad analytic framework and wealth of concrete examples provide a sophisticated, yet accessible, guide to the many strands and interrelations in this critical arena of world peacebuilding.'
This book tells the story of the tragedy of Iraq, from the first discreet meetings to plan the political transition through the debacle the United States created even as President Bush was declaring 'mission accomplished', on up to the January 2005 Iraqi elections. The author was a senior adviser and foreign affairs expert working with the State Department's Future of Iraq Project, which was undermined when the US Defense Department was put in charge of postwar reconstruction on the eve of the war.

'This Task Force carefully assesses the status of America's nation-building capacities and recommends concrete ways for the US government to better plan for and carry out stabilization and reconstruction operations.'
rennaissance since the early 1990s. It has been used to describe and to justify the military interventions in Somalia, Afghanistan and Iraq. Linked to the idea of 'failed' or 'failing' states, the concept is used to hide and legitimise a whole range of diverse policies, allowing foreign powers to control and reshape countries in areas of conflict. Currently the international debate on nation-building is heavily dominated by US actors and authors, especially by writers connected to the Bush administration or its policies. The book presents academic and political alternatives, presenting a critical view from 'Old Europe'. The book combines academic research and analysis with policy orientation, with contributors from both fields. It clarifies the terminology distinguishing developmental, peace-related, imperial and analytical approaches to nation-building. Highlighting its connections to globalisation, democracy, ethnic and religious minorities, the contributors consider case studies such as Somalia, the Balkans, Afghanistan, Iran and Nigeria.'

'It is hard to over-estimate what is at stake in Iraq today. The removal of Saddam Hussein's regime in April 2003 has proved to be the beginning, not the culmination, of a long and uncertain process of state-building. This paper examines the process from a military, political and sociological perspective. Possible futures for Iraq are charted, first by studying the evolution of the criminal and politically motivated violence that has come to dominate the everyday lives of ordinary Iraqis. The paper then details the strengths and weaknesses of the political structures built after the fall of Saddam’s regime, from the formation of the Iraqi Governing Council in 2003 to the elections of January 2005, and traces the forces driving political mobilisation in post-Saddam Iraq. It concludes by analysing the ramifications of regime change for US policy and the wider Middle East.'

'The goal of this paper is to provide suggestions for a more comprehensive and coherent approach to addressing the broad security challenges posed by post-conflict situations. The concrete policy recommendations set forth here flow from a focus on security governance as a means of conceptualising and linking post-war security challenges. The core argument is that since the threats to security in post-conflict situations are multilayered, multifaceted, and inter-connected, addressing them effectively requires an approach that both acknowledges this reality and generates more systematic and holistic strategies for addressing them. The concept of security governance, in other words, recognises both the multidimensional nature of security and reality that in post-conflict situations, moving from insecurity to security requires a complex and lengthy process of reconfiguring the security roles and responsibilities of a wide range of actors - from local warlords to international organisations - in order to ensure that the provision of security is 'governed' in ways that contribute to, rather than undermine, sustainable peace. Not only must security be provided in the immediate aftermath of conflict; but the domestic security structures of the war-torn state must be reformed and/or reconstituted; non-statutory armed actors must be disarmed, demobilised, and re-integrated; and myriad additional obstacles to peace - from anti-personnel landmines and unexploded ordnance to small arms and light weapons to the lingering presence of war criminals - must be confronted. Rather than seeing these as discrete, independent tasks, the proposition put forward here is that addressing them all as part of a broader security governance strategy provides a more promising approach.'

'The interaction of failed states, terrorism and the need for 'nation-building' is at the top of the international agenda, with particular focus on Afghanistan and Iraq. This collection brings together top analysts to examine the goals and challenges facing efforts to reconstruct states that have collapsed into anarchy or have been defeated in war. Drawing on lessons from fifty years of past experience with post-conflict reconstruction and development around the world, the authors provide historical context, identify difficulties that can impede progress, and recognize the realistic limitations of ambitions to create new states. They assess ongoing development plans in a country devastated by more than a century of conflict. Throughout, particular attention is paid to the interaction of the goals of external and domestic actors, highlighting the importance of understanding the internal social, economic, and political environment of the society receiving assistance. The authors explore Afghanistan's economic, political, social and physical needs, assess the Interim Government's and international organizations' plans for reconstruction, and review the prospects for developing a peaceful and productive society in the future.'

'What do we owe Iraq? America is up to its neck in nation building - but the public debate, focused on getting the troops home, devotes little attention to why we are building a new Iraqi nation, what success would look like, or what principles should guide us. This book sets out to shift the terms of the debate, acknowledging that we are nation building to protect ourselves while demanding that we put the interests of the people being governed - whether in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kosovo, or elsewhere - ahead of our own when we exercise power over them. The author argues that to prevent nation building from turning into a paternalistic, colonialist charade, we urgently need a new, humbler approach. Nation builders should focus on providing security, without arrogantly claiming any special expertise in how successful nation-states should be made. Drawing on his personal experiences in Iraq as a constitutional adviser, the author offers enduring insights into the power dynamics between the American occupiers and the Iraqis, and tackles issues such as Iraqi elections, the prospect of successful democratization, and the way home. Elections do not end the occupier's responsibility. Unless asked to leave, we must resist the temptation of a military pullout before a legitimately elected government can maintain order and govern effectively. But elections that create a legitimate democracy are also the only way a nation builder can put itself out of business and - eventually - send its troops home.'

'Since 1990, more than 10 million people have been killed in the civil wars of failed states, and hundreds of millions more have been deprived of fundamental rights. The threat of terrorism has only heightened the problem posed by failed states. This is the first book to examine how and why states decay and what, if anything, can be done to prevent them from collapsing. It defines and categorizes strong, weak, failing, and collapsed nation-states according to political, social, and economic criteria. And it offers a comprehensive recipe for their reconstruction. The book comprises fourteen essays by leading scholars and practitioners who help structure this disparate field of research, provide useful empirical descriptions, and offer policy recommendations. The editor's substantial opening chapter sets out a theory and taxonomy of state failure. It is followed by two sets of chapters, the first on the nature and correlates of failure, the second on methods of preventing state failure and reconstructing those states that do fail. Economic jump-starting, legal refurbishing, elections, the demobilizing of ex-combatants, and civil society are among the many topics discussed.'

'All fourteen major peacebuilding missions launched between 1989 and 1999 shared a common strategy for consolidating peace after internal conflicts: immediate democratization and marketization. This volume argues that transforming war-shattered states into market democracies is a basically sound idea, but that pushing the process too quickly can have damaging and destabilizing effects. A more sensible approach would first establish a system of domestic institutions capable of managing the disruptive effects of democratization and marketization, and only then phase in political and economic reforms as conditions warrant. Avoiding the problems that marred many peacebuilding missions in the 1990s will require longer-lasting, better-planned, and ultimately more intrusive forms of intervention in the domestic affairs of war-torn states.'

'Although military operations have dominated media coverage of the war on terrorism, a much broader array of policy options may hold the key to reducing the appeal of global terrorist networks, particularly in economically destitute areas. These strategies involve the use of 'soft power', a term first used by political scientist Joseph Nye in a 1990 article in 'Foreign Policy' to describe nonmilitary strategies to shape international relations and behavior. This book discusses four aspects of soft power. The first section of the book considers failed or falling states as havens for transnational terrorist networks, and examines the most effective ways to build stable nations in unstable regions, including focused looks at Afghanistan and Sierra Leone. The second section explores postconflict reconstruction, including in-depth examination of security, justice and reconciliation, opportunities for achieving socioeconomic well-being, and increased participation in government. The third section then examines public diplomacy, asking whether the United States needs new policies or simply a new image to increase its appeal in the Arab and Muslim world. The final section of the book looks at foreign assistance, and assesses the potential of the current administration's 'Millennium Challenge Account' to combat poverty, increase democracy, and reduce the appeal of terror. This book presents a balanced assessment of the role that nonmilitary options can play in combating transnational terrorist networks.'

'Despite progress in the return of refugees and the prevention of humanitarian disasters, stability in Afghanistan is threatened by ethnic tension, feuding warlords, and violence perpetrated by regrouping elements of the Taliban and their allies. The United States is being asked to increase its level of commitment to rebuilding Afghanistan as a means of stabilizing the country, even as American troops battle the resurgent Islamic extremists who operate along the Afghan-Pakistan border. An increase in the US commitment to Afghanistan's reconstruction is unlikely to speed up that nation's progress toward stability and peace. With fighting between rival warlords still raging, and neighboring nations vying for influence in Afghanistan, American entanglement in Afghan civil affairs will only distract from the major goal of eliminating the anti-American forces that were instrumental in the 9-11 attacks. The United States can best aid Afghanistan by accelerating the war against Islamic extremists, paving the way for Afghans to reconstruct their own political and economic systems. The alternative - a US-imposed political structure - will only serve to increase anti-American sentiment. America's prior nation-building experiences suggest that external aid has a limited effect in the reconstruction of so-called failed states. Afghanistan provides a model for a broader policy framework wherein American intervention would be confined to eliminating national security threats rather than getting entangled in counterproductive nation-building exercises around the globe.'

Notes: 'In April of 2003, a stunned world looked on as the armed forces of the United States and Britain conducted a lightning-fast military campaign against Iraq. Confounding predictions of failure, the Anglo-American victory brought down not just the Iraqi regime, but also much of the conventional wisdom about modern war. But even as US and British forces occupied Basra, Tikrit, and Mosul, the Iraqi nation slipped into anarchy - and new military and security challenges emerged. Such has been the twisted trail of dramatic events that we call the Iraq War. But like so many other conflicts, the war ultimately seemed to pose more questions than it resolved. What about the prewar political fights in Washington, Paris, and the UN? Was victory really due to the brilliance of Anglo-American arms, or has Saddam's regime simply been too rotten to stand? Why didn't Baghdad become a second Stalingrad? Why weren't the occupying forces prepared to impose order? And then there is the mother of all questions: where are Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, and what went wrong with intelligence estimates? The author provides here the first in-depth examination of the key issues swirling around the most significant US war since Vietnam. Finding answers is essential if we are to understand the United States' awesome power and its place in a new age of international terror and regional conflict. Finding answers is also essential if we are to draw the proper lessons and understand the new challenges of conflict termination, peacemaking, and nation building.'

'This memorandum recommends that the administration adopt a three-phased approach that distinguishes between short-term necessities and long-term goals and objectives. In the medium-term, the key challenge will be to devise a transitional strategy that takes Iraq from the current situation to a more secure and prosperous future. There should be no illusions that the reconstruction of Iraq will be anything but difficult, confusing, and dangerous for everyone involved. However, segmenting the strategy into distinct phases and ensuring that Iraqis play a major role in determining the fate of their country will reduce the chance that one brutal strongman will be substituted for another - reproducing historical patterns and necessitating future interventions - and will also help increase the likelihood that the United States is seen internationally, in the region, and in Iraq to be working to promote Iraqi interests as opposed to assumed US ones. Finding the right Iraqi allies will be key to restoring Iraqi sovereignty and making possible an early American exit.'
A US-led assault on Iraq will have unpredictable and possibly profound effects on Iraqi society. Moreover, those effects will vary with the objectives and strategy adopted by the US and its allies as well as by the pace and scope of the collapse of Iraqi resistance. Further, the reach of Washington's post-war objectives has not yet been settled. Given these multiple sources of uncertainty, understanding the relationship between Iraqi society and the Iraqi state after three decades of Ba'ath rule is all the more crucial to the success of post-war efforts to reconstruct the country and reconstitute its political system. Yet that relationship is poorly understood in the West. The Iraq of today cannot easily be mapped on to a neat diagram of sect, tribe, or party. The rentier structure of the state economy, the regime's manipulation of group identity to control the population, the emergence of a shadow state that distributes public goods to advance regime interests, and pervasive violence have transformed Iraq's socio-political landscape into dangerous and unfamiliar ground for intervention. These essays delineate the options now being debated in Washington and provide up-to-date assessments of how Iraqi state and society will respond to the impact of war and the removal of a deeply-rooted authoritarian regime.

'The ouster of the Saddam Hussein regime in Iraq has led to a variety of new and important questions about the evolution of Iraqi society and national identity. These questions concerning how Iraqis view themselves have serious implications for the US military presence in Iraq which remains in the aftermath of Saddam's removal. A new Iraqi nationalism or sectarian chauvinism may feed anti-US efforts and actions, endangering US troops and disrupting Iraqi reconstruction. It is correspondingly vital that Iraqi nationalism does not begin to define itself with anti-Americanism as a major component. This monograph addresses the critical questions involved in understanding the background of Iraqi national identity and the ways in which it may evolve in the future to either the favor or detriment of the United States. The monograph also provides particular attention to the issue of Iraqi sectarianism and the emerging role of the Shi'ite Muslims, noting the power of an emerging but fractionalized clergy. The result is a thoughtful and probing report including policy recommendations for US military and civilian decisionmakers that helps to illuminate the complex subjects of Iraqi nationalism and sectarianism and their relevance to the US presence in Iraq.'

'The overarching question that this paper addresses is: how can the security sector be reformed to curtail the power and influence of the warlords and challenge the underlying culture of warlordism that is so deeply ingrained in Afghan society? The study focuses on three specific elements of the security reform agenda that have been prioritized by stakeholders in the Afghan reconstruction process because of their significance to ongoing efforts to restore a basic level of security and stability to the country. These three pillars are: the reconstruction of a broadly representative national armed forces, the creation of a national police force, and the implementation of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programs on the regional and national level. Comprehensive security sector reform is not limited to these pillars. Quite the contrary, they should serve as a foundation upon which further reform initiatives, such as judicial and prison reform, can be developed. This report aims to identify and assess the plans established to address the three pillars, the progress made thus far in the implementation of these plans, and the challenges that face the reform process at various levels.'

'The increasingly popular idea in Washington that the United States, by toppling Saddam Hussein, can rapidly democratize Iraq and unleash a democratic tsunami in the Middle East is a dangerous fantasy. The US record of building democracy after invading other countries is mixed at best and the Bush administration's commitment to a massive reconstruction effort in Iraq is doubtful. The repercussions of an intervention in Iraq will be as likely to complicate the spread of democracy in the Middle East as promote it. The United States has an important role to play in fostering democracy in the region, but the task will be slow and difficult given the unpromising terrain and lack of US leverage over key governments.'

Notes:
'The commitment of the Bush administration to regime termination in Iraq is so strong that a war with Iraq early in 2003 is now highly likely. Regime termination is thought necessary, in part, because of Iraq's likely development of weapons of mass destruction, but the control of the region's oil resources is also a major factor. Although the regime is weaker than eleven years ago, it is probable that most of its elite forces will resist attack. The regime will seek to draw foreign forces into a war in the greater Baghdad region, US war plans are expected to focus on destroying Iraq's military and administrative infrastructures, denying the regime access to its energy supplies and drawing out the elite forces so that they can be subject to intensive air attack. Evidence from the 1991 war indicates that it is highly likely that the regime will use all available military means, including chemical and biological weapons, if its very survival is threatened. In such circumstances, and especially if high casualties result, there is a possibility of a nuclear response. The British Government, in particular, has been candid in conceding this as a potential response to CBW use by Iraq. The United States has sufficient forces to ensure regime destruction but the regime's replacement by occupying forces or by a client regime, even if the war is not greatly destructive, should be expected to increase regional opposition to the US presence. It is likely, in particular, to increase support for organisations such as al-Qaeda and to prove counter-productive to peace and stability in the region. Given these major consequences of a war - high civilian casualties, risk of the use of weapons of mass destruction and post-war regional instability - alternatives to war should be sought as a matter of urgency.'

Since 1996, Bosnia and Herzegovina has been the site of a remarkable project of political engineering. A complex consortium of international agencies backed by Western governments have been transforming a devastated, ethnically partitioned, post-war territory into a multi-ethnic, democratic and economically viable state. Despite an enormous investment of personnel and resources, six years later BiH's post-Yugoslav future remains tenuous. Did the engineering project work? In an era when countries from Somalia to Afghanistan are confronting questions of state legitimacy amidst international intervention, this book is a fascinating study on the dilemmas of the post-Cold War international order. How effective are international 'peace-building' interventions in fractured states? Is the preservation of a multinational state desirable - or even possible - where the majority of citizens only reluctantly acknowledges its legitimacy? Drawing on the author's extensive field experience, this book takes a hard look at the issues that Bosnia continues to face. Juxtaposing big-picture analysis with an intimate knowledge of the region, Bose situates the international community's extensive program of state-building and democratization in BiH since the Dayton Peace Agreement in the context of Bosnia's - and the former Yugoslavia's - complex historical legacy of coexistence and conflict. Bose tells the gripping story of the divided city of Mostar, and analyzes the post-Dayton institutional structure and process. He dissects the making of the Dayton peace accords through American-led coercive diplomacy, and provides a constructive critique of international peace-building.

on state security sectors. External actors involved in 'protectorates' such as Kosovo and East Timor and peace agreements such as Cambodia, El Salvador or Bosnia have come face to face with the problems exposed by factionalised, wrong-sized, dictatorial and non-professional security sectors. Consequently, international institutions, the UN or World Bank, for example, and individual government ministries in countries such as the UK, USA and Germany have been increasingly concerned with promoting security sector reform (SSR). This paper argues, however, that while there is much discussion about capabilities for SSR and its technical requirements, there has been insufficient analysis of how to mobilise such resources. Three central questions, therefore, are examined: how have the external approaches to SSR evolved and what do they entail; what specific problems does the SSR agenda face operationnally; and what concrete policy recommendations for engagement can be drawn from reform experiences to date.'

The authors shed light on the unique conditions for and constraints on peacebuilding in each country and examine the quality and coherence of international responses. 'A milestone in the search for sustainable peace, this handbook highlights the invaluable contributions of people working in the field. The authors clarify how field-workers 'fit' in the overall peacebuilding process; provide details of the most effective practices; and offer guidelines for preparing for the field. Part 1 of the book introduces concepts and tools for sustainable peacebuilding, including chapters on selecting and training field-workers. Part 2 focuses on seven specific peacebuilding activities: mediation, monitoring, linking development aid and peacebuilding, training local peacebuilders, dealing with the media, reconciliation, and peacekeeping. Part 3 addresses the practical and emotional problems that field-workers confront on an almost daily basis. And Part 4 provides an overview of the lessons learned from the previous chapters. Written for a broad readership, the book offers a repertoire of concrete methods that researchers and practitioners can use to analyze contemporary conflict dynamics to develop a better peacebuilding architecture and to heighten the synergy of their efforts.'

such as economic sanctions or diplomatic pressures have failed, military interventions have been undertaken. This book examines four US-sponsored interventions (Panama, Somalia, Haiti, and Bosnia), focusing on efforts to reconstruct the state which have followed military action. Such nation-building is vital if conflict is not to recur. In each of the four cases, the author considers the factors which led the USA to intervene, the path of military intervention, and the nation-building efforts which followed. The book seeks to provide a greater understanding of the successes and failures of US policy, to improve strategies for reconstruction, and to provide some insight into the conditions under which intervention and nation-building are likely to succeed.'

'The fragile peace agreements of the post-Cold War years that have sought to resolve protracted conflicts fall well short of being genuine, stable settlements. This volume is concerned with how those agreements might be strengthened and, especially, how best to conceptualize the period after a tentative peace has been negotiated. Six case studies explore three major conflicts from differing perspectives: Northern Ireland is discussed by Catholic and Protestant scholars, and Palestinian and Israeli researchers examine the Arab-Israeli relationship. Bosnia and the Dayton Accords are addressed in the third set of cases. The concluding section of the book focuses on more general aspects of peacemaking and peace building, incorporating psychological, moral, and political approaches. In the final chapter, Rothstein suggests that attention to the ways in which the pre- and postpeace periods are different might inform a carefully constructed strategy with the potential to transform a tentative settlement into the reconciliation of ancient enemies.'

De rol van NGO's in wederopbouw.
(INTERNATIONALE SPECTATOR, jg. 61, nr. 2, februari 2007, p. 84-86.)
Author(s):
1. Boer, Diederik de
Subject(s):
1. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION
2. NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS
Notes:
The author deals with the delicate process of reconstruction by non-governmental organizations in post-conflict countries. The natural role of NGOs is to link grass-roots societies with the local, national and even international actors for poverty alleviation. Usual NGO approaches are (1) providing aid which is not provided by other actors; and (2) acting as a countervailing power to the government in order to provide a platform for the poor. The author suggests that the role of local government is not always properly addressed by the NGO community, which provides basic services to the population in need and therefore runs the danger of pushing aside interests of the fledgling government in reconstruction. The local and provincial government would deserve much more attention, efforts and resources from the NGO community as the local level is the natural working environment for NGOs. Traditional local grassroots institutions should become an integrated aspect in the overall state-building process. The critical problem here is the countervailing power role of NGOs. Supporting local government makes it impossible for them to fulfil the role of countervailing power as conflicts of interest might occur. The two roles should not be mixed.

Notes:
The author looks at the intricate and complex relationship between 'human security' and successful reconstruction in post-conflict situations. Introducing the dilemma, it is argued that restoring order is by no means a guarantee for lasting security. Moreover, military intervention is only a very first step towards a very complicated transition, with reconstruction of the state as the ultimate objective. But blueprints of future state structures guaranteeing and providing both collective and individual security are - in most cases - shrouded in dense fog. Analysing two recent incidents in Iraq and Afghanistan, the author argues that, although the areas for reconstruction activities are in theory well-defined, in practice the presence of security guarantees and 'guarantors' is the overriding precondition for a successful state reconstruction. However, as the transition process unfolds, this precondition is influenced by three separate developments: transferring security tasks from external to internal guarantors; developing of both a normative compass and proper risk-management tools; and the day-to-day prioritising of security itself. To minimise the negative effects the author advocates an integrated, localised approach to the provision of security whilst reconstructing. The relatively successful PRT model used in Afghanistan should include local and regional security-needs assessments and introduce a variety of field specialists in order to improve local and regional capacity building.

Notes:
The purpose of this volume is twofold. First, it is to survey the issues that remain in the wake of the political transition mandated in Bonn in 2001 that concluded with the establishment of parliament in 2005. Many of these hinge on complex economic and political relations within society, region and the world. Central to all, is how to manage them within the context of the state. Second, the aim is to shed light on the question: what are the implications of this new type of peace operation for its practice in Afghanistan and elsewhere? Among the generic observations that are made, it is evident that elements of peace operations - military peacekeeping, civil military relations, humanitarian aid, governance and political assistance, human rights, rule of law and policing - are all necessary components of a single, comprehensive effort. The requirement for security and stability on a global scale appears to foreshadow more such statebuilding operations in the future, and it is likely that the practice of peacekeeping and its derivates will continue to be subsumed as a constituent part of this new approach to security.

Notes:
The author deals with the role of the military in post-conflict reconstruction. Closer interaction between military and civil actors in peace support operations has become a new phenomenon. The Civil–Military Cooperation (CIMIC) concept which has been developed by the Netherlands Ministry of Defence in support of military missions, honours the dictum 'as civilian as possible, as military as necessary'. The four objectives of CIMIC are: force protection, force acceptance, signal function towards the population and reconstruction activities on a limited scale. As all this requires an integrated approach, the Dutch government has introduced the Defence, Diplomacy and Development (DDD) concept. This is implemented in the current Dutch mission to Uruzgan in Afghanistan. The leadership of the Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) consists of a military commander, a political adviser from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and two advisers from Development Cooperation. 'Defence' is emphasising stability through developing national security organizations, 'Foreign Affairs' focuses on improving local, regional and national government, while 'Development Cooperation' is improving perspectives for the rural population.

Afghaanse problematiek vereist regionale aanpak.
(INTERNATIONALE SPECTATOR, jg. 61, nr. 9, september 2007, p. 435-439.)

Notes:
The author presents an overview of problems encountered by United Nations and NATO forces involved in Afghanistan's reconstruction. Of October 2006, the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) is carrying out its UN-mandated mission throughout the whole of Afghanistan. ISAF's principal mechanism for rebuilding Afghanistan is the Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT), composed of military and civilian officials. PRT's are charged with extending the reach of the Afghan government by improving governance and rebuilding the economy. ISAF is hampered in its operations by insufficient troops, limitations that some allies have placed on their troops and significant differences in how individual NATO governments run their PRT's. In recent years the Taliban have become stronger in the southern part of Afghanistan. They have found a particularly hospitable environment in the radicalized tribal border areas in Pakistan, from which they cross the porous borders into Afghanistan to attack ISAF-forces. Security studies have highlighted the difficulty of putting together societies that have broken down without the support of neighbouring states and of suppressing well established insurgencies that enjoy external support and sanctuary on the other side of the border. In conclusion, Afghanistan has to be dealt with as a regional problem that involves India, Iran, Russia and in particular Pakistan.

1. Sky, Emma
Subject(s):

3. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION--AFGHANISTAN
Notes:
According to the author, NATO and ISAF need a clear vision of what they want to achieve and be clear in their own minds of what is pragmatically possible. This requires them to decide what constructive contribution they can make and to define when an end state has been reached. This in turn requires ISAF to establish an exit strategy from Afghanistan, one that leaves the country with a stable Afghan government and effective security forces. In the process of achieving these objectives, it is important that NATO also establishes and builds on strategic partnerships with other actors, especially the UN Security Council’s United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA). For these reconstruction and development objectives to be possible the author argues that contributing NATO nations, and allies, should better understand the country and its people, find out what motivates the many insurgents opposing them, the Taliban in particular, and the extent of external involvement in the country.

Notes:
None of the proposals for extracting the United States from the debacle in Iraq recognise the root causes of the violence and instability that has plagued the country since April 2003. The origins of the Iraqi civil war lie in the complete collapse of both the administrative and coercive capacity of the state. The Iraqi state, its ministries, their civil servants, police force and army ceased to exist in a meaningful way in the aftermath of regime change. It is the United States' inability to reconstruct them that lies at the heart of the Iraq problem.
Until the state's capacity is substantially rebuilt - if ever - Iraq will continue to be violently unstable. Unless the United States can commit the generation-long project of rebuilding the Iraqi state, Iraq will continue to be a place of misery for its population and instability for its region. This is a defeat of historic proportions for US foreign policy.

Notes:
In the literature on post-conflict reconstruction, the intervention in Iraq has been understood as an exception to, if not an aberration from, contemporary state-building. This articles argues that whether Iraq is an exception to, or the epitome of post-conflict reconstruction depends on the genealogy one attributes to the latter. Denying that Iraq is an exemplary instance of contemporary reconstruction means neglecting the continuity of state-building from interwar trusteeship via Germany and Vietnam to the contemporary state-building from reproduction of the neoliberal model - continuities which the example of Iraq exposes more clearly than prior cases. An outline of the genealogy of state-building and an analysis of Iraqi reconstruction both point to the reproduction of a hegemonic international order as the rationale of statebuilding now and then.

Notes:
   This article surveys recent cases of internationalized statebuilding in postintervention, post-(ethnic) conflict societies in the light of an academic tradition that has seen military forces as a particularly effective vehicle for integrating a country's diverse population. It is argued that armed forces that are ethnically representative in their ranks and leadership can encourage a sense of commonality across ethnic boundaries, which can help secure a fragile peace. However, the connection between representativeness and integration is intricate; and whereas outside powers may enable otherwise unlikely outcomes, their leverage is circumscribed by a number of factors. The article also suggests that an ethnically representative army may 'tie up' capabilities in ways that reduce the likelihood of military intervention in politics or (ethnic) violence perpetrated by military personnel.

3. UNITED NATIONS--ARMED FORCES--KOSOVO (SERBIA)

Notes:
This article explores the relationship between security sector reform (SSR) and democratic transition in post-conflict contexts, drawing on Kosovo as a case. The study focuses in particular on the justice sector in Kosovo, reviewing the ways in which security, the rule of law and democracy have been intertwined. The article first outlines the context of the international mission in Kosovo, before proceeding to consider how the objectives, needs and constraints of different actors have influenced the reform of the security institutions and the democratization process. Thereafter, it discusses the concepts of SSR and democratic transition, briefly reviewing the UN discourse and record in SSR-related activities. Finally, it explores the interplay of these factors in the Kosovo justice sector reform process. The main finding stemming from this analysis is that not only do SSR and democratization agendas interfere with each other, but measures adopted to cope with security challenges related to the post-conflict context can also affect them both. Furthermore, this finding demonstrates that a well-developed UN theoretical discourse is still not matched by the reality of UN practices in the field.

Can Peacekeepers Be Peacebuilders?.

(INTernational Peacekeeping, vol. 14, no. 3, June 2007, p. 323-338.)

Author(s):
1. Hazen, Jennifer M.

Subject(s):
1. UNITED NATIONS--PEACEKEEPING FORCES
2. PEACE--BUILDING

Notes:
The role of UN peacekeeping missions has expanded beyond the traditional tasks of peacekeeping to include a wide range of political, economic, and humanitarian activities. While such expansion indicates an improved understanding of the complexities and challenges of post-conflict contexts, it also raises questions about whether UN peacekeeping missions are equipped to handle peacebuilding tasks. Evidence from a study of the peacekeeping mission in Sierra Leone suggests they are not. This article argues that peacekeeping missions are a poor choice for peacebuilding given their limited mandates, capacity, leverage, resources and duration. Peacekeepers should focus on peacekeeping, by which they can lay the foundation for peacebuilding. Peacebuilding should be the primary task of national governments and their populations.

The author reviews recent debates in the field of peace building. Several commentators have questioned the liberal assumptions and goals of the peace-building operations of the past ten to fifteen years. The attempts to transform war-shattered states as fast as possible into 'liberal market economies' have sometimes had disastrous consequences. Peace builders should postpone the introduction of democratic and market-oriented reforms until state institutions are strong enough to ensure the rule of law. The author points out that these conclusions may seem to be logical, but are nonetheless very alarming. State formation is - as history shows - a violent and complicated process, and it is very unlikely external peace builders can direct that process without becoming directly involved in the conflicts and violence which are always part of it and which in the long run will undermine the humanitarian idealism that justifies peace-building operations.

fuelling, prolonging and taking commercial advantage of violent conflicts, still prevails. So far the scientific community has been reluctant to extend the scope of research on 'corporate social responsibility' to the area of security in general and to intra-state armed conflicts in particular. As a consequence, there is no basis from which systematic knowledge can be generated about the conditions and the extent to which private corporations can fulfil the role expected of them in the political discourse. The research on positive contributions of private corporations to security amounts to unconnected in-depth case studies of specific corporations in specific conflict settings. Given this state of research, the authors develop a framework for a comparative research agenda to address the question: Under which circumstances and to what extent can private corporations be expected to contribute to public security?

Peacebuilding as Practice: Discourses from Post-Conflict Tajikistan.

Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING--TAJIKISTAN
2. TAJIKISTAN--HISTORY--CIVIL WAR, 1992-1994

Notes:
Peacebuilding is a contested concept which gains meaning as it is practised. While academic and policy-relevant elaboration of the concept is of interest to international experts, interpretations of peacebuilding in the Central Asian arena may depart immensely from those envisaged within the western-dominated 'international community'. This article opens up the dimensions and contingent possibilities of 'peacebuilding' through an investigation of two alternative approaches found in the context of Tajikistan. It makes the critique that peacebuilding represents one contextually grounded basic discourse. In the case of Central Asia, and in particular post-conflict Tajikistan, at least two other basic discourses have been adopted by parties to the post-Soviet setting: elite mirotroitelstvo (Russian: peacebuilding) and popular tinji (Tajik: wellness/peacefulness). Based largely on fieldwork conducted in Tajikistan between 2003 and 2005, the argument here is that none of these three discourses is merely an artificial or cynical construct but that each has a certain symbolic and normative value. Consequently, a singular definition of Tajik 'peacebuilding' proves elusive as practices adapt to the relationships between multiple discourses and identities in context. The article concludes that 'peacebuilding' is a complex and intersubjective process of change entailing the legitimation of new relationships of power.

Organising for Nation Building.
(SURVIVAL, vol. 49, no. 2, Summer 2007, p. 43-76.)
Author(s):
1. Bensahel, Nora
Subject(s):
1. NATION BUILDING
Notes:
Recent years have seen numerous initiatives to build organisational capacity for nation-building operations in both national governments and international organisations. These initiatives have made some progress, but they share a number of common problems, including bureaucratic turf wars, interagency and intergovernmental coordination challenges, limited financial resources, and shortages of qualified personnel. If left unchecked, these problems may prevent these initiatives from addressing the capacity challenges they were designed to solve.

Notes:
In the late 1990s the Democratic Republic of the Congo collapsed into one of the most devastating wars in modern history. In 2006 it held successful elections, and appears, albeit haltingly, on the road to long-term stability. The progress achieved owes a good deal to the cooperative nation-building efforts of the United Nations and the European Union. The EU has given the UN's long-standing mission critical military support and engaged deeply in economic, humanitarian and democratisation projects. This military strategy of 'punctuated' intervention has allowed EU governments to avoid a costly long-term commitment of troops while capitalising on the marginal value of Europe's highly capable forces when necessary.

Notes:
In this insightful review of the 2006 Israel-Hezbollah war the author identifies the mistake that Israel made in viewing Hezbollah geo-strategically, a proxy of Syria and Iran. He then details how the United States may be making the same mistake. The author warns that attempts to eradicate Hezbollah and its influence by military means is a strategy flawed in its design (and in Israel's case) failed in execution. He concludes that the current situation in Lebanon should be viewed in the context of the series of conflicts that have afflicted the nation throughout its history. He cautions that attempts by the international community to stabilize and reconstruct the country should be primarily focused on the political objective of strengthening the current Lebanese government.

1. NATION BUILDING--USA

Notes:
Americans usually perceive nation-building missions as failures even when they succeed on the ground. In interventions such as Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, Kosovo, Afghanistan and Iraq, win or lose, America will be seen to lose. Four factors underlie this 'quagmire mentality': American ideals, elite rhetoric, memories of Vietnam, and media manipulation. The quagmire mentality undermines public approval for nation-building, thereby limiting the United States' capacity to carry out such operations, and it also influences the ways in which Americans learn from past missions.

3. POLICE

Notes:
The fundamental objective of the United States in its efforts to reform justice systems abroad has been to develop effective institutions of criminal justice that can support transitions to democratic government. Unfortunately, the United States has not been doing this as well as it might, Iraq being the most dramatic case. These efforts lack coherent Congressional oversight and strategic vision, neglect improving the normative quality of local justice systems and developing the capability to manage by results, and subordinate local reform to the security needs of foreign countries. To remedy these shortcomings, the United States needs to develop and coordinate justice assistance programs that are context specific, recruit and deploy justice specialists from all sectors and levels of the American justice system, incorporate a developmental perspective in justice assistance programs, and formulate programs that are based on proven 'best practices'.

Notes:
It is argued that the process of reconstructing weak and failed states along liberal democratic lines is a cultural rather than a merely technical issue. The work of Alexis de Tocqueville provides key insights into the foundations of liberal democracy and the limitations on the ability of foreign countries to export liberal democratic institutions via military occupation and reconstruction. After considering these insights, the implications for reconstruction efforts are considered.

Notes:
Replacing an unsatisfactory government, then reconstructing and reforming a society from one condition to a better condition, is a complex, time consuming, expensive and difficult venture. It is important in light of recent regime change ventures to consider how future military-led interventions might be better planned and managed. To this end, this article offers a conceptual construct for military-led interventions. It first considers the nature of military-led interventions intended to effect regime change, and then develops a conceptual construct for reconstruction and societal reform that intervention forces can apply at the national, provincial and local levels of society.

The case first describes the context and 'lead nation' approach to SSR, and then considers the negative consequences of the lack of local ownership. At the time of writing, it seems highly unlikely that the international approach to SSR will lead to national institutions and security forces capable of maintaining security in Afghanistan.

Subject(s):
1. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION--IRAQ
2. IRAQ WAR, 2003-

Notes:
This article argues that the prewar planning process for postwar Iraq was plagued by myriad problems, including a dysfunctional interagency process, overly optimistic assumptions, and a lack of contingency planning for alternative outcomes. These problems were compounded by a lack of civilian capacity during the occupation period, which led to a complicated and often uncoordinated relationship with the military authorities who found themselves taking the lead in many reconstruction activities. Taken together, these mistakes meant that US success on the battlefield was merely a prelude to a postwar insurgency whose outcome remains very much in doubt more than three years later.

Building a Republican Peace: Stabilizing States after War.

Author(s):
1. Barnett, Michael

Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING

Notes:
Although peacebuilders do not operate from a common template, liberal values so define their activities that their efforts can be called 'liberal peacebuilding'. Many postconflict operations aspire to create a state that contains the rule of law, markets, and democracy. Growing evidence suggests, however, that liberal peacebuilding is re-creating the conditions of conflict; states emerging from war do not have the necessary institutions or civic culture to absorb the pressures associated with political and market competition. In recognition of these problems and dangers, there is an emerging call for greater attention to the state and institutionalization before liberalization. These critiques, and lessons learned form recent operations, point to an alternative - republican peacebuilding. Drawing from republican political theory, this article argues that the republican principles of deliberation, constitutionalism, and representation can help states after war address the threats to stability that derive from arbitrary power and factional conflict and, in the process, develop some legitimacy.

Republican peacebuilding is not only good for postconflict states; it also is appropriate for international peacebuilders, who also can exercise arbitrary power.

Preparing for Nation-Building.

Author(s):
1. Dobbins, James

Subject(s):
1. NATION BUILDING

Notes:
Preparation for nation-building requires that responsible political leaders consult both with regional and functional experts, those who know why the society in question descended into conflict and those who know from experience elsewhere how to put such societies back together. Goals must be established which transcend the most immediate and normally negative purposes of the intervention, e.g. halting conflict, stopping genocide or turning back aggression. These positive goals must be commensurate with the scale of military manpower and economic assistance likely to be committed. The larger the social transformation envisaged, the greater the resistance likely to be encountered. The most common cause for the failure of nation-building endeavours is a mismatch between objectives and commitments.

Beyond the widely recommended attention to the large and small technical tasks in the areas of security, democracy, administrative capacity, and economic reconstruction, this paper points to the importance of dynamics such as a real and lasting commitment by the United States and the coalition, the emergence of widely supported and particularly talented Iraqi leadership, and increased evidence of 'learning' among Iraqi elites and masses and among the coalition and international community.

Why Humanitarian Interventions Succeed or Fail: The Role of Local Participation.
Author(s):
1. Gizelis, Theodora-Ismene
2. Kosek, Kristin E.
Subject(s):
1. HUMANITARIAN INTERVENTION
2. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION
Notes:
Why do interstate interventions, even when carried out with the best of intentions, so often fail to contain conflicts and support a peaceful settlement? The authors argue that the extent of local participation exerts a strong effect on the prospects for successful peace-building and reconstruction efforts in the wake of humanitarian interventions. Even though the population in target countries may sympathize with the goal of the intervention, local populations are unlikely to feel a personal attachment to a solution externally imposed unless actively consulted or involved in the intervention strategy. Humanitarian interventions without some form of local participation are likely to create cognitive dissonance among the local population between the outcome and the means chosen to implement it. The authors evaluate their hypotheses about the relationship between local involvement and successful post-conflict reconstruction by looking at variation in conflict and local involvement over time in two humanitarian interventions, Bosnia (1991-95) and Somalia (1987-97). Consistent with their hypotheses about how lack of local involvement can undermine post-conflict reconstruction efforts in the wake of interventions, they find that phases with more local involvement are associated with lower levels of conflict.

Subject(s):
1. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION--AFGHANISTAN
2. AFGHAN WAR, 2001-
Notes:
The author examines the history and future of America's recent involvement in Afghanistan. He postulates that success in Afghanistan hinges on 'four moving parts'. First is the continuing success of the Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs), supported by the American-led Coalition of Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF). The second factor is what the author terms the 'main cog', the development and expansion of the Afghan National Army (ANA). Complementing the first two factors is the continuing expansion of the role of the 4,500-strong European-led, International Security Assistance Force (ISAF). The final 'moving part' is the institution-building and coordination efforts of the OEF, ISAF, the Afghan Ministry of Defense, the National Directorate of Security, and police forces in Kabul. The author says that in 2005 the situation in Afghanistan has progressed to a point where guarded optimism is justified.

Though critics have made a number of telling points against the Bush administration's conduct of the Iraq war, the most serious problems facing Iraq and its American occupiers - criminal anarchy and lawlessness, a raging insurgency and a society divided into rival and antagonistic groups - were virtually inevitable consequences that flowed from the act of war itself. Military and civilian planners were culpable in failing to plan for certain tasks, but the most serious problems had no good solution. Even so, there are lessons to be learned. These include the danger that the imperatives of 'force protection' may sacrifice the broader political mission of US forces and the need for scepticism over the capacity of outsiders to develop the skill and expertise required to reconstruct decapitated states.

One of the myriad of questions confronting international law as a result of the invasion and occupation of Iraq has been whether and how the need to reconstruct Iraq economically and politically can be reconciled with the demands of the law of military occupation. Moreover, did the occupying powers adequately address this problem prior to the handover of power to Iraqi authorities on 28 June 2004? This article explores some of the key issues raised in this context. It analyses the juridical basis for the law of military occupation and then examines some of the key political, institutional and economic reforms that have been instituted in Iraq. Three potential sources of authority for these reforms are suggested and then critically examined as to their validity and scope. These are the vicarious authority arguably provided by the Iraqi Governing Council (IGC), Security Council authority which may supervene conventional international humanitarian law in this area and, of course, the authority provided by the treaties regulating military occupation themselves, in particular article 43 of the Hague Regulations.

Notes:
Efforts to improve national and international capabilities to plan and manage post-conflict reconstruction operations are underway in many countries and are high on the agenda of several multilateral institutions. The international community has learned lessons from the numerous post-conflict reconstruction and nation-building operations that it has engaged in since the end of the Cold War but Iraq represented the most difficult and ambitious operation undertaken to date. Although the coalition effort in Iraq had many unique features, we can nonetheless draw lessons from the tenure of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) both for the ongoing effort in Iraq and more broadly for future post-conflict reconstruction operations. This article discusses the challenges of post-conflict reconstruction planning and mission management and assesses what happened under the CPA. It draws lessons for the future international effort in Iraq and for the international community as it considers how to plan and organize future such missions.

Notes:
The Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) in Iraq was a civilian administration conjured up from almost nothing after the initial conflict was already over. It was inevitable that it should have suffered from grave shortcomings in management, organisation, staffing, direction and resources. But some of these were avoidable. While governments and the headquarters in Baghdad focussed on high political and constitutional matters and the organisation of large-scale contracts, CPA staff on the ground elsewhere faced very different challenges with which they were ill equipped to deal. The prevailing security environment was the key to all other activity, but there was a close relationship between this and progress over reconstruction, the development of local as well as national government, and the perceptions of the Iraqis.

Notes:
In a global order based on juridical sovereignty of nation-states, the missions called 'peacebuilding' by the UN or 'stabilisation operations' by some governments necessarily require the building of states. The international organisations and governments involved in such efforts, however, have neither the doctrine nor organisation for such tasks. Problems encountered in recent efforts signal the need for a unified international counterpart for the recipient national government. Peacebuilding and statebuilding require transitional governance institutions that incorporate the concurrent need for internal and external legitimacy transparently, rather than in a fragmented, secretive and ad hoc way. The peacebuilding mechanisms proposed by the Secretary-General’s High-Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change have the potential to bring order into the anarchy often created by multiple agendas, doctrines and aid budgets.

Addressing Ethnic Divisions in Post-Conflict Institution-Building : Lessons from Recent Cases.

Author(s):
1. Simonsen, Sven Gunnar

Subject(s):
1. ETHNIC RELATIONS
2. NATION BUILDING

Notes:
Where the lines of an armed conflict coincide with ethnic boundaries, the political salience of ethnicity increases. In post-conflict situations that may seem defined by 'ancient hatreds', the political salience and character of ethnic identities remain dynamic. Bringing together contributions from the comparative politics literature on power-sharing and the policy-dominated field of post-conflict peacebuilding, this article examines how ethnic divisions have been addressed in recent cases of institution-building directed by international forces following military intervention - in Bosnia, Kosovo, Afghanistan, and Iraq. It finds that an 'assumption of intransigence' has often influenced decisions on institutional design, and that the institutionalization of ethnicity has become an important hindrance to peacebuilding. Against this background, the article argues in favor of institutional designs that do not fixate the accentuation on ethnicity in politics: more flexible ways should be sought to assure inclusivity and representativeness for different ethnic groups. There exists a wide range of institutional-design options that can be combined, on the basis of in-depth assessments of each individual conflict, to de-ethnicize politics and build sustainable peace.

Notes:
  It is ten years since the Dayton peace settlement, which formally ended the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina in November 1995. Since then there has been much discussion about the steep learning curve necessary for the new international tasks of state-building and post-conflict peacebuilding. BiH was the first such extensive international project since the post-Second World War US-led occupations of the defeated Axis powers Germany and Japan. Today, with the end of cold war geo-political divisions, BiH has become widely seen as a template for new experiments in international administration and external assistance in state reconstruction and post-conflict reconciliation. The contributions in this collection seek to probe the lessons of the BiH experience and highlight the nature of the problems confronted by international policy-making institutions; exploring the limitations and possibilities for external influence and drawing attention to some of the unintended consequences of projects of this kind.

Important steps towards the reconstruction of and state-building in Afghanistan have been taken. In January 2004, the constituent Loya Jirga has adopted a constitution. Elections are scheduled for fall of 2004. However, they will take place only if the security situation is going to be improved and elections in the more remote provinces are possible to be held in a safe and secure environment. The increase in the number of PRTs could contribute to supporting the confidence of the people in the state-building process. At the international Afghanistan Conference in Berlin on 31 March/1 April 2004 the political perspectives for the country were possible to be demonstrated by having the elements of security, reconstruction, and democratization tied up in a compact package. Afghanistan must remain on the top of the agenda of NATO and EU. This is also a test to show how Europe is going to handle the new threats in the 21st century.

Après l'opération américaine en Afghanistan, à l'automne 2001, l'accord de Bonn du 5 décembre a fixé les étapes du processus de paix, sous l'égide de l'ONU. Celle-ci exerce un rôle d'encadrement et de soutien à la reconstruction du pays, tout en laissant une coalition d'États gérer le volet sécuritaire. Ce processus a donné lieu à un phénomène d'afghanisation de la démocratie qui rend tout relatif le succès de l'aide internationale. Le président Karzai a posé les bases d'un régime néo-monarchique, dont la nouvelle armée nationale, formée par les États-Unis, la France et le Royaume-Uni, est l'instrument privilégié. Mais cette stratégie centralisatrice suscite de nombreuses résistances parmi l'élite afghane issue de la guerre et du djihad. Pour réussir, le président Karzai devra à la fois se doter d'un appareil d'État efficace et légitime et, surtout, élargir ses soutiens politiques en montrant sa capacité à redistribuer les ressources de l'État, en particulier les subsides internationaux.

Afghanistan, Iraq and the US-led 'war' on international terrorism are at different critical phases, but the fates of all three are now interlocked. The outcome in one is capable of seriously affecting the fortunes of the others. Afghanistan has achieved a great deal during its two-year transition from a theocratic past, but is now balanced on a knife-edge. By comparison, Iraq, where the United States and its allies are both politically and militarily in serious trouble, faces further upheaval with uncertain outcomes. Meanwhile, the war on terror has lost its initial focus.

3. IRAQ--POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT
Notes:
Although the early US blunders in the occupation of Iraq are well known, their consequences are just now becoming clear. The Bush administration was never willing to commit the resources necessary to secure the country and did not make the most of the resources it had. US officials did get a number of things right, but they never understood—or even listened to—the country they were seeking to rebuild. As a result, the democratic future of Iraq now hangs in the balance.
A year after the third Gulf war and the fall of Saddam Hussein, the process of political reconstruction in Iraq under US stewardship is beginning to reveal its weaknesses. From the outset, the United States centered on two communities that had been kept out of power since the founding of the Iraqi nation, the majority Shiites and the Kurds. The Sunni Arabs, the foundation of Saddam's regime, felt marginalized. The problem is that a 'Lebanese' style reconstruction where each faction is accorded power not according to its political opinions or competences, but rather simply its membership in a given community, could rapidly reach an impasse. Worse, it could lead to confrontations that could degenerate into civil war. To avoid this predictable catastrophe, the US needs to get out of an 'occupation' mentality and place American troops under UN command. Under the auspices of the United Nations it must implement a national patriotic program that recognizes the three identities that define Iraq.

Notes:
This article examines Canadian experiences, policies, and practices with regard to police reform - a key element of the security sector reform agenda - in post-conflict or failed states. While an entire mythology has developed around Canada's role as originator and long-standing champion of peacekeeping in its military guise, less attention has been paid to policing as the second core pillar of security in transitions from conflict to peace. The article assesses Canada's contributions, and the possibilities for greater Canadian involvement, in this area. It considers both domestic and international obstacles to a greater Canadian role and examines ways in which some of these challenges might be overcome.

A Self-restrained Approach to Nation-building by Foreign Powers.

1. Etzioni, Amitai

Subject(s):
1. NATION BUILDING

Notes:
Nation-building by foreign powers can rarely be accomplished and tends to be very costly, not merely in economic resources and those of political capital, but also in human lives. Foreign powers often attempt to tackle numerous tasks with little discernible effect. Therefore, whatever resources foreign powers are willing and able to commit should be focused on a modest agenda - what is termed in this article a 'restrained approach'. A restrained approach focuses first and foremost on pacification and security, it deals with whoever is in power initially and it requires local people to overcome some challenges by themselves. Greatly curtailing foreign ambitions and promises will lead to much greater credibility of drives for democratization; will provide stronger domestic support for such efforts among the taxpayers and donors who have to foot the bills; and will pay off by focusing more resources on the few facets of society that are relatively easy to change.

Notes:
As recent efforts in Bosnia, East Timor, Sierra Leone, Afghanistan, and now Iraq attest, state building has become a growth industry. Even the Bush administration, once highly resistant to US involvement in such missions, is now willing to engage in state-building projects based on the recognition that failed states and rogue regimes seeking weapons of mass destruction post the main security threats to the international community. The authors examine several cases in which major powers and international institutions have sought to prop up or rebuild a weak or collapsed state. Concluding that 'the international system remains badly organized and badly served for dealing with the implications of state collapse', the authors propose a system of neotrusteeship to facilitate coordination of future state-building activities.

Subject(s):
1. Nation Building--Afghanistan

Notes:
Would greater UN involvement have avoided any of the mistakes made by the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA) in administering Iraq ? Three of the most egregious errors - failing to provide for emergency law and order, disbanding the Iraqi army and blanket de-Ba'athification - ran counter to lessons from previous operations. But the greatest mistake by US planners may have been the assumption that previous UN nation-building efforts have achieved limited success because of UN incompetence, rather than because of the inherent contradictions in building democracy through foreign military intervention. The United States is now engaged, in Afghanistan and Iraq, in two of the most ambitious nation-building projects in its history. The US took a predominant role in part because of the circumstances in which the two conflicts commenced, but also as an extension of the present administration's more general suspicion of multilateral institutions such as the United Nations. This suspicion now undermines the changes of either operation concluding successfully.

A second objective is to provide an assessment of the attempts at overcoming those various obstacles and to offer an analysis of the reform path currently followed by the High Representative Paddy Ashdown and his team. Ultimately, the aim is to assess if the massive international involvement characterizing post-conflict Bosnia has started to bear fruit and if the country today has a real opportunity to move at a quicker pace towards European integration.

Notes:
Since the end of the Cold War, the United States and the United Nations have both been heavily engaged in nation-building and have developed their own distinct approaches to the conduct of such missions. In the aftermath of its early and widely publicised failures in Somalia and Yugoslavia, the UN's reputation for competent nation-building was seriously damaged, and demand for its services fell off noticeably. More recently, the US reputation for competence in the field has suffered as a result of setbacks in Afghanistan and Iraq. A new study by the RAND corporation indicates that UN-led operations tended to be smaller, shorter, less expensive and, on average, more successful than those led by the United States. This divergence in performance can be explained in part by the greater inherent difficulty of some of the US-led operations, but is also a product of the UN's greater success in learning from experience.

In this article the author focuses initially on the degree of support provided by the international community to the interim administration of Afghanistan and notes that the pledges made at the Tokyo Conference do not equate to the per capita levels of funding made available for other recent emergencies. He draws attention to the inter-relationship between security and funding for reconstruction and comments that the recent decision of the US government to join with others in agreeing to finance work to upgrade the major highway system is very timely in shoring up the regime in the wake of the recent assassination attempt on Hamid Karzai. He stresses that the international community needs to provide sustained support to the new government if it is to survive. He also analyses the complex relationship between the administration and the aid community and reports on the calls by the government to be given the major part of the resources allocated by international donors and to be supported to take the lead in determining policy and strategy. The author notes the nature of the Afghan economy and the potential for reconstruction, taking into account the economic impact of the conflict, the progress made by the aid community since 1992, the humanitarian crisis arising from the drought of 1999-2001 and the large scale, mainly involuntary, return of refugees from Pakistan and Iran since March 2002. He comments on the fact that the agricultural economy cannot support its population, on the need for economic safety valves in the form of migration to Pakistan and Iran, on the availability of camps for internally displaced people, and on urbanization. In concluding the author is both optimistic and cautious, noting the fragility of the situation, but also acknowledging that the international community is taking timely action to address it through reconstruction assistance although it remains reluctant to give sufficient priority to security provision.

Subject(s):
1. DEMOCRATIZATION--IRAQ
2. IRAQ--POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT
3. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION--IRAQ
4. IRAQ WAR, 2003-
Notes:
This article focuses on the feasibility of installing a democratic government in Iraq now that Saddam is gone and suggests ways to increase the chances that pluralism will take root. It seeks to answer the following questions: what problems are inherent to democratization in divided societies such as Iraq? What are the strengths and limits of a federal solution to Iraq's problems? What risks are likely during Iraq's transition to democracy? What challenges specific to Iraq will further complicate matters? How can (and should) the United States and other intervening powers influence democratization? These concerns - though of immediate policy interest - are in essence social science problems, and existing scholarship can shed considerable light on them. This article concludes that, if Iraq does not receive massive help from the United States and other powers, a range of problems will make democracy hard to establish. Challenges that may arise include a weak government that engenders security fears, a lack of a cohesive identity to unify Iraq's different communities, a risk of meddling from Iran and Turkey, bellicose elites who pursue adventurism abroad and whip up tension at home, a poorly organized political leadership, and a lack of a history of democracy.

1. Byman, Daniel L.

Subject(s):

Notes:
Occupying Iraq will be more difficult than conquering it. Intervening forces face a gamut of daunting tasks: ensuring order, ending Iraq's weapons-of-mass-destruction programmes, helping Iraqis build a power-sharing system, reforming Iraq's military and transforming the regional security environment. Even if all goes well, Iraq's many problems will take years to resolve. Coalition forces must prepare to keep a large (and expensive) troop presence in the country for many years. Success will require both the careful application of force and diplomacy. Most importantly, Iraqis must play a role to minimise charges of imperialism. Although the burden of occupation is heavy, shirking it will lead to disaster.

What follows the war in Iraq will be at least as important as the war itself. Nurturing democracy there after Saddam won't be easy. But it may not be impossible either. Iraq has several assets going for it, including an educated middle class and a history of political pluralism under an earlier monarchy.

Notes:
The main problem following a US-led international intervention in Iraq will be re-establishing widespread and sustainable governance. It is probable that with the removal of repressive political authority, state control will falter and crime rates boom. This can be countered through an international civil administration with law and order as a guiding mandating principle. Order could be ensured by 'policekeeping', via a large 'blue force' of primarily Muslim gendarmerie from surrounding nations. Reliance on military peacekeeping is precarious because of the political sensitivities in the case of Iraq. The blue force would form the foundation of the new internal security architecture in Iraq, and would act to prevent fragmentation and civil war. The role of policekeeping is to preempt and combat ethnic, religious, and political violence, economic crime and the establishment of shadow networks, as well as policing regular crime including those of property and public order. A further vital task would be the development of domestic judicial and policing capacity, which provide an exit strategy for the international mission and the beginnings of a representative and regionally devolved governance structure. These tasks could be financed through a modification of the current oil for food programme, finally transferring this wealth back into Iraqi society. The goal would be to construct a self-sustaining democratic and economically functional state governed by the rule of law, one that can serve as a political beacon for the region.

Notes:
Since the end of the Cold War the United States has led six major nation-building operations - that is to say, the use of military force in the aftermath of a conflict to underpin a transition to democracy. In Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, Kosovo, Afghanistan and most recently Iraq, the US has renewed with varying success a form of activity upon which it had embarked in Germany and Japan at the end of the Second World War. Study of these past missions suggests a host of lessons applicable today in Iraq, and raises the question of why, in light of its substantial and recent experience, the US government's learning curve appears so flat.

Saddam Hussein ruled through the 'shadow state' a network of patronage and violence that transformed Iraqi society. For the United States to successfully break the shadow state and build a stable government, it has to change how it interacts with the Iraqi population. This would involve the move from despotic power, the deployment of military force to facilitate the state's survival, to infrastructural power, and the creation of legal rational and legitimate state institutions that rule by consent. The only way to do this administratively and politically is to adopt a 'micro-management' approach. This would mean building state capacity and democratic institutions locally, from the ground up. By doing this, resentment and nationalist anger among the population could be reduced.

Local Level Challenges to Post-conflict Peacebuilding.

Author(s):
1. Manning, Carrie
Subject(s):

2. NATION BUILDING

Notes:
Laying the basis for a sustainable political order in the aftermath of civil war requires a broader perspective on the state than the one commonly taken by analysts and practitioners of peacekeeping and peacebuilding. In particular, it calls for closer attention to the building of state authority and capacity at local levels. While there is a growing literature on the political imperatives of building a lasting peace following negotiated termination of civil wars, for the most part research has focused on the construction of the central political institutions. However, negotiated peace settlements often face their greatest challenges at the local level, when the principles of the political settlement negotiated at the centre are extended throughout the national territory. This article reviews local level challenges to peacebuilding in the 1990s and urges an approach to peacebuilding informed by closer attention to the multiple layers of the state and the statebuilding process.

Organizations in the peacebuilding field face the imperative of taking a holistic, integrated approach to peacebuilding that combines traditionally distinct disciplines such as human rights, humanitarian assistance, sustainable development, environment, conflict resolution, security, and the rule of law in order to be effective in today's complex conflicts. The concept of a Network of Effective Action is proposed as a set of practices for collaboration that is capable of facilitating integrated approaches to peacebuilding both on the ground and in terms of the theoretical development of the field.

The author gives a critical assessment of the US' attempts at nation-building in Afghanistan and Iraq. In both cases, the author points out, the main reason for the lack of progress is the failure to empower local government. In the case of Afghanistan, the government exists but does not receive the necessary funding whereas substantial financial means continue to be in the hands of warlords. In Iraq, the US is caught between the imperative to hand over real power to the Iraqi people as soon as possible and the need to maintain a forceful occupation to maximise the possibility of turning the country into a stable and reasonable democracy.

The Paradox of Sovereignty : International Involvement in Civil Service Reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

1. Zaum, Dominik

2. SOVEREIGNTY

Notes:
This article explores the normative framework within which international administrations engage in post-conflict statebuilding. By looking at the aims and justifications for the involvement of the international community in the reform of the civil service in Bosnia and Herzegovina, it shows how this intervention is shaped by a liberal conception of state sovereignty that emphasizes legitimate state authority by pushing for certain reforms. The article concludes that international involvement can be characterized as a 'paradox of sovereignty': the international administration compromises aspects of Bosnia's sovereignty to enable BiH to fulfil its obligations as a sovereign. The tensions this creates have important implications for liberal thinking about the subject of international relations, and for the policymaking of international administrations.

In the past several decades, the international community has relied on three approaches to deal with countries that descend into chaos. It has supported strongmen capable of reimposing order by force; it has given up in despair, leaving the country to sort out its problems as best it can; and, most recently, it has embarked on ambitious projects to reconstruct the country in the image of a modern secular, multiethnic, and democratic state. None of these approaches should be used in Afghanistan.

Notes:
The author examines the war scenarios in Iraq and their possible short- and long-term implications for the regional context. He argues that, while the US-led military action will probably meet with weak Iraqi resistance, it is likely to become an additional factor of regional instability and, in particular, cause a further intensification of the already intractable Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The author notes that following the occupation of Iraqi territory, the US will face formidable challenges such as humanitarian assistance, management of refugees flows and internal policing, for which it seems ill-prepared. Recalling the past record of conflict in the Middle East, he underlines that the US's ability to influence the main regional actors and enforce a postwar regional order has serious limits. Hence, the Bush administration's expectation that an Iraqi defeat will generate a positive 'domino effect' in the region seems to be overly optimistic.

If Saddam Hussein is overthrown by an internal coup, his regime could be succeeded by something similar, albeit with softer edges. A US-led invasion, however, could cause the United States to embark on an ambitious plan for 'state reconstruction'. In doing so, the stamina of the United States will be severely tested by the resistance of the 'shadow state', the lure of communal politics, the indispensability of the security forces and the temptations of massive oil revenues. Faced by regional states determined to play a 'spoiler' role, the United States may reduce its exposure and accept much of the status quo in Iraq. Saddam would have gone, but the Iraqis would be left a government little more representative than they have at present.

Author(s): 1. Hijden, Sebastiaan van der Subject(s): 1. Peace-building--Bosnia and Herzegovina
Notes: The author analyses three striking developments in Bosnia and Herzegovina on its rocky road to lasting peace and mature democracy: 1) an increase in local criticism of the international guardianship by the powerful Office of the High Representative; 2) a local call for ownership of the peace process and a demand for equality through partnership and; 3) recent attempts to restructure the international presence to enhance its performance, the streamlining process. The major stimuli behind these developments are a radical change in the political climate through the election of the moderate, multi-ethnic Alliance for Change and the international desire to withdraw from Bosnia within the foreseeable future.
Incremental progress in Bosnia illustrates that it is still too early to initiate a process of withdrawal, but the international authority can take advantage of the new dynamism by re-adjusting its strategy. A commonly agreed upon agenda for the next decade, containing realistic benchmarks (linked to gradual withdrawal), may be a valuable guide. Moreover, the authority guiding the process can only seize the window of opportunity by assisting the peace process in a way that is both accountable to the Bosnian citizenry and yet leaves room for Bosnian politics to develop.

1. Intervention (International Law)
2. Nation Building
3. Nation Building--Bosnia and Herzegovina
4. Bosnia and Herzegovina--Politics and Government
Notes:
This article analyzes whether nation-building-style interventions can work. Rather than seeking to debate the propriety of interventions in theory, it asks more practically whether the strategy has any hope of succeeding. History shows that intervention can indeed serve power interests, but holds fewer examples demonstrating the success of nation-building attempts, particularly in enforcement contexts. The article addresses this question by examining the most comprehensive and long-lasting nation-building attempt to date, the NATO and OSCE effort in Bosnia. By posing four questions which can be used to assess progress, the article attempts to determine the value of nation-building as an international strategy by assessing the political, social, and economic efforts to rebuild the country. Finally, it seeks to define the lessons learned by six years in Bosnia in terms of both constructing more effective operations in the future and informing world publics more adequately about their length and complexity.

Nation Building's Newest Disguise.

Subject(s):
1. Terrorism--Government Policy--USA
2. Nation Building--USA
Notes:
Many analysts and politicians have claimed that the September 11 terrorist attacks on the United States provide concrete evidence that the United States should incorporate 'nation building' into its national security strategy as a tool for preventing the formation or continued existence of states where international terrorists can organize and operate. The more partisan of those observers further claim that George W. Bush was wrong to criticize nation building during the 2000 presidential campaign and that the Clinton administration's much-maligned efforts in Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, and Kosovo are vindicated as a result. Such claims, however, are simplistic and amount to little more than an attempt to dress up nation building in the realist attire of national self-interest.

Civil Society and Peacebuilding in Bosnia and Herzegovina.
Author(s):
1. Belloni, Roberto
Subject(s):
1. CIVIL SOCIETY--BOSNIA AND HERCEGOVINA
2. PEACE-BUILDING--BOSNIA AND HERCEGOVINA
Notes:
The concept of civil society has acquired an unprecedented worldwide popularity, especially in development programs. This article investigates the international effort to build civil society in Bosnia and Herzegovina in order to foster peace and democratization, this in response to disappointment with traditional economic, military, and political strategies. The results of this major investment of resources, however, have been unsatisfactory. The international community's lack of a coherent long-term strategy and the adoption of a conception of civil society that is often at odds with Bosnian context and history hinder the transition to genuine reconciliation among the three ethnic groups. Examining two major areas of intervention - facilitating the advocacy role of local civic groups and fostering citizens' participation - the author shows that the international community has failed to comprehend both the political and the social meaning of its involvement. Although the focus on civil society is meant to overcome the limits of external regulation and to emphasize indigenous and community-based contributions to peacebuilding, the international community's approach is to make local development dependent upon the international presence. The result is a failure to address the structural problems that affect the country and to hinder, rather than foster, the formation of an open and democratic civil society.

Alice in Wonderland Meets Frankenstein : Constructivism, Realism and Peacebuilding in Bosnia.

Author(s):
1. David, Charles-Philippe
Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING--BOSNIA AND HERCEGOVINA
Notes:
Using the constructivist and realist approaches, this article explores the philosophy and results of the peacebuilding mission in Bosnia. The author outlines the two approaches and especially delves into their divergent views of peace, on how to obtain and implement it. The theoretical interpretations are then applied to the explanation of the conflict in Bosnia and what it takes in the long run to build a durable peace. The constructivist and realist prescriptions prove to be quite divergent in that regard. The main thrust of the article analyses three particular dimensions of peacebuilding in Bosnia: the security, political-democratic and socio-economic transitions, toward reconciliation and prevention of renewed conflict. The results of these transitions are measured up against the theoretical assertions and are compared in order to conclude on the validity of constructivism and realism as applied to the Bosnian case. Reconciling Alice (the peacebuilder) and Frankenstein (the realist) indeed proves to be an almost insurmountable task.

Intelligence and Post-Conflict Reconstruction in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Subject(s):

2. NATION BUILDING--BOSNIA AND HERCEGOVINA
Notes:
Intervention lessons of the last decade underscore the importance of non-traditional intelligence support to post-conflict reconstruction efforts. Political exploitation of ethnicity, organized crime, political corruption, and at-large war criminals undermine international efforts of nation building. For American and coalition forces to be successful in peacekeeping, peace enforcement and nation building, a new approach to intelligence is required. Analysis of US European Command intelligence reporting suggests that not enough tactical intelligence is produced for SFOR to combat crime and corruption in Bosnia-Herzegovina. With this disadvantage, international attempts to rebuild Bosnia-Herzegovina will continue to stagnate. Intelligence to support these missions requires expertise normally resident in law enforcement agencies. For the international community to be successful, intelligence must not only shift from the strategic level to the street level in Bosnia-Herzegovina, but also from US ONLY to UN RELEASABLE.

Notes:
  Is the US government really any good at 'helping people' in troubled places? America's recent encounters with nation building suggest the contrary. Indeed, Washington said it would bring order to Somalia but left chaos; it went to Haiti to restore democracy but produced tyranny; it intervened in Bosnia to reverse the effects of a civil war but now oversees an unsustainable peace; and it occupied Kosovo to build a multiethnic democracy but has instead witnessed ethnic cleansing on a widespread scale. That all these recent attempts at nation building have not actually solved the problem they set out to address seems not to have phased policy makers.

Subject(s):

Notes:
  There are two gaps in our ability to build peace. We need to organize more effectively both on control violence and to build relationships. Game theory gives us a picture of how these two processes are related. To control violence, we need different types of organizations for different security challenges, including the full spectrum of military, paramilitary and police assets. Transitional police forces with civilian oversight at local level can help to bridge the gap between military security and public order. Mixed teams of local and international civilian facilitators can help to build grass-roots relationships, by drawing on expertise in areas of security, development, governance and reconciliation. Working from the bottom up presents an opportunity to compare the results of different organizational solutions to the problems of peacebuilding.

2. UNITED NATIONS--ARMED FORCES

Notes:
This study offers some reflections on the remarkable attempt by the international community between December 1988 and February 1999 to bring a number of prolonged and vicious internal wars to an end by securing and consolidating peace agreements through UN-run peacebuilding operations. Based on an original 1978 UN Security Council mandate for ending colonial rule in Namibia, surprisingly revived and extended ten years later in entirely different circumstances, it envisaged two complementary tasks for the international community: the negative task of helping to prevent a relapse into war, and the positive task of assisting in the construction of a self-sustaining peace. The former, defined here as a response to the challenge of 'Clausewitz in reverse'- the continuation of the politics of war into the ensuing peace- predominates in the early stages, involving a number of uncomfortable trade-offs and compromises hazardous for the long-term prospect of sustainable peace. The latter, premised on the liberal universalist assumption that market democracy best guarantees an enduring peace, may nevertheless in the short term increase instability and undermine attempts to prevent a relapse into war. The ensuing tensions seem unavoidable. Has the experiment been successful? Are there better alternatives? In addressing these questions, the literature on post-settlement peacebuilding is reviewed from a conflict resolution perspective. It is concluded that, despite severe criticism, the experiment has not been shown to have failed. In particular, the experience of UNPROFOR and UNOSOM II, which were not post-settlement peacebuilding operations, should not serve to discredit the undertaking. Although the withdrawal of MONUA from Angola in February 1999 may be seen to have brought to an end the heroic age of UN post-settlement peacebuilding, a number of more modest recently initiated missions suggest that the enterprise has not been entirely abandoned. This offers hope for the future.

Does Peacebuilding Build Peace? : Liberal (Mis)steps in the Peace Process.

Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING
Notes:
'Peacebuilding' is a popular concept today in UN missions. Elements of this practice have been present in various forms in over a dozen UN operations since the end of the Cold War. However, the solutions proposed and implemented can aggravate rather than alleviate problems. Risks must be weighed before liberal premises are applied to conflict resolution and the promotion of peace. 'Gradualists' and 'synergists' disagree as to the timing, the consent of the parties involved and the proper executors of such missions. The various phases of security, democratic and socio-economic transition all pose problems to peacebuilding in practice. The expectations of peacebuilding must be scaled down to enable the procession through these phases to be accomplished circumspectly and gradually, once the nature of the mission has been established.

Peacebuilding and Police Reform.
(International Peacekeeping, vol. 6, no. 4, Winter 1999, Special Issue.)
Subject(s):
1. POLICE
2. CIVIL SOCIETY
3. PEACE-BUILDING
Notes:
This volume addresses the issue of internationally-assisted police reform in transitions from war to peace. The authors' purpose is to show how this is becoming an increasingly important element in peace settlements today. They also wish to provide a mixture of theoretical insights and informed case-studies which may help in developing such assistance further, while avoiding the pitfalls of the past. This volume also focuses on 3 main variants of international support for police reform. First, there is international support channelled through and coordinated by the UN or by regional organizations, within the CIVPOL concept. Second, it discusses international support channelled through the UN, but not within the CIVPOL concept; and third, it looks into bilateral support for such reform processes.

The Limits of Peacebuilding: International Regulations and Civil Society Development in Bosnia.

The article questions the assumption that solutions to 'complex political emergencies' necessitate extended long-term international regulation over the civil and political reconstruction process. One example where international peacekeeping has extended beyond the traditional remit of disarmament and the separation of combatants to civilian democratization and civil society development is that of Bosnia. The limited success of civil society development suggests that the extension of international supervision over the Bosnian state may risk institutionalizing division and political fragmentation. The comprehensive nature of new international peacebuilding mandates could become counter-productive if they result in the marginalization of locally accountable solutions.

The Kosovo Conflict and the Swiss Contribution.

This article analyses Swiss policy during the Kosovo conflict and the subsequent peace-building process. It advocates first of all the establishment of a robust, coherent and long-term civilian and military framework to reconstruct the war-torn region and therefore favours an integrated approach to peace-building in Kosovo that overcomes the Dayton approach of institutional separation. Second, Switzerland's present and future participation is analysed. Although the country's options are limited, it can make valuable contributions to the ongoing international aid efforts. The study advocates the establishment of a civilian peace-building unit which provides the technical backbone of an international peace-building mission, favours technical assistance to several international activities and argues that Switzerland could make a major contribution to the establishment of subsistent agricultural structures. The conclusion draws lessons from the Kosovo conflict for Switzerland's security policy.
Securing Peace in Kosovo: The Challenges Ahead.
(CIVILIAN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE (NATO Parliamentary Assembly), 1999, 25 p. (491.6/19).)
Author(s):
1. Chauveau, Guy-Michel
Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING--KOSOVO (SERBIA)
Notes:
This report is largely based on information garnered during a visit of the Civilian Affairs Committee to Kosovo on 30 September – 1 October 1999 and builds on the Secretariat Report issued immediately after the visit. The report is divided in five chapters addressing, respectively: the security challenge; the coordination of international action; medium-term political challenges; long-term security challenges.

Joint Actions for Peace-building in the Mediterranean.
(INTERNATIONAL SPECTATOR, vol. 34, no. 4, October – December 1999, p. 75-90.)

2. MEDITERRANEAN REGION--NATIONAL SECURITY
3. INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCES
4. PEACE-BUILDING--MEDITERRANEAN REGION
Notes:
This article explores the extent to which the future Charter will be able to prescribe and promote Euro-Med cooperation in peace support, responses to humanitarian emergencies and election monitoring. All these activities fall into the broad category of peace-building. They are 'soft' in nature and should therefore be palatable to the various views of security cooperation in the Mediterranean.

Les limites du concept de consolidation de la paix.
(REVUE INTERNATIONALE ET STRATEGIQUE, no. 31, automne 1998, p. 57-75.)
Author(s):
1. David, Charles-Philippe
Subject(s):
1. PEACE-BUILDING
Notes:
L'un des concepts populaires dans les missions actuelles de l'ONU est celui de la consolidation de la paix. À l'instar de plusieurs autres notions utilisées depuis la fin de la Guerre froide, surtout dans le cadre des opérations de paix des Nations unies, le 'peacebuilding' est désormais un terme consacré. Que signifie ce concept ? Quelle est la théorie et l'application de celui-ci ? Quels critères peut-on retirer de son analyse pour permettre ultérieurement de juger de son applicabilité dans des missions précises ? Ces questions orientent cette présentation, articulée autour de trois dimensions : en premier lieu, l'auteur examine le concept et soulève certains problèmes de définition ; en second lieu, il lie le concept à la théorie libérale sur la sécurité et, enfin, il analyse sa portée empirique en signalant les difficultés et les contradictions qui découlent de son application.

Peacebuilding and the Limits of Liberal Internationalism.
(INternational Security, vol. 22, no. 2, Fall 1997, p. 54-89.)

Author(s):
  1. Paris, Roland

Subject(s):
  1. PEACE-BUILDING

Notes:
The proliferation of peacebuilding operations in recent years has given rise to a burgeoning academic literature on the subject. Although many of these studies have helped identify the strengths and weaknesses of particular operations, scholars have devoted relatively little attention to analyzing the concept of peacebuilding itself, including its underlying assumptions. What paradigm, or paradigms, of conflict management inform the work of peacebuilding agencies ? How do these paradigms shape the conduct of peacebuilding operations in practice ? Are current approaches to peacebuilding well suited to the task of consolidating peace in war-shattered states ? Is there a better alternative ? By addressing these questions, this article investigates the conceptual foundations of peacebuilding, and analyzes the relationship between these conceptual foundations and the actual effectiveness of peacebuilding as a method of preventing the recurrence of civil violence.

Peacebuilding as Developmentalism : Concepts from Disaster Research.
(Contemporary Security Policy, vol. 16, no. 3, December 1995, p. 320-346.)

Author(s):
  1. Pugh, Michael

Subject(s):
  1. INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCES
  2. DISASTER RELIEF
  3. PEACE-BUILDING

Notes:
This article begins by establishing what is meant by 'peacebuilding' and explains how it has evolved as a concept for propelling economic and social development. It then argues that evolutions in disaster research render that field a relevant source of ideas for UN peacebuilding. Allowing for significant distinctions between civil disasters and complex emergencies with violence, the article shows that there are parameters and principles, and indeed predicaments, which can be applied to the concept of peacekeeping as developmentalism.
