- 'With the ever-increasing interdependence across individuals, groups, international organizations, and nation-states an increasingly significant policy concern in the contemporary turbulent world of globalization is the question of state failure. There has been a growing academic interest in the determinants of state failure and an acute awareness across the international community of the need for dealing with issues of instability in states. The contributors to this volume represent the most recent cutting edge approaches to state failure—looking at both conditions of conflict and economic development, dealing with the conceptualization, causes, and consequences of state failure, as well as policy-oriented analyses as to how state failure can be contained, reversed, or prevented. In order to deal fully with the phenomenon of state failure, investigators must be involved in a number of boundary-crossing activities.'

This volume focuses on the history of nation-building during the era of decolonization and the Cold War and on the more recent post-Cold War and post-9/11 pursuit of nation-building in what have become known as 'collapsed', 'collapsing', 'failed' or 'failing' states. 'Today between forty and sixty nations, home to close to a billion people, have either collapsed or are teetering on the brink of failure. The world's worst problems - terrorism, drug and human trafficking, absolute poverty, ethnic conflict, disease, genocide - originate in such states, and the international community has devoted billions of dollars to solving the problem. Yet by and large the effort has not succeeded. The authors explain here through vivid on-the-ground examples why past efforts have not worked and advance a groundbreaking new solution to this most pressing of global crises. Military force, while certainly necessary on occasion, cannot solve the fundamental problems, and humanitarian interventions cost billions yet do not leave capable states in their wake. The authors argue that only an integrated state-building approach can heal these failing countries. Their state-building strategy, which assigns responsibility equally among the international community, national leaders, and citizens, maps out a clear path to political and economic stability. The authors provide a practical framework for achieving these ends, supporting their case with examples of struggling states such as Afghanistan, Sudan, and Nepal as well as the world's success stories - Singapore, Ireland, and the American South.'

Governance in Post-Conflict Societies : Rebuilding Fragile States - Abingdon, UK : Routledge.

'This book explores the problem of states that fail, leading to conflict and war, and how to rebuild them. Focusing on governance as critical to post-conflict reconstruction, the contributors illustrate the connections among the core functions that governance fulfills in any society: assuring security, achieving effective provision of public goods and services, and generating legitimacy. This volume brings together chapters by scholars and practitioners studying and working on governance issues from a variety of perspectives. Divided into three sections, this volume opens by taking a fresh look at the historical record on nation-building, constitutional design in deeply divided societies, the dynamics of elections, and governance of the security sector. It then explores the range of actors involved in governance reconstruction and highlights the evolving role of the US military, the influence of multinational firms, the importance of the civil service, and the potential impact of Internet-based diasporas. Finally, it looks at local governance, highlighting the subnational state-society structures and relations in fragile and post-conflict states, and draws on case studies from Latin America, Africa, and Afghanistan.'

Notes:
'Since 1945, the average length of civil wars has increased threefold. What can explain this startling fact? It can't be ethnic hatreds and injustices - these have been around for centuries. The author points here to the crucial role of the international community in propping up many new and weak states that resulted from the decolonization movement after World War II. These impoverished states, prone to conflict, lack the necessary resources to resolve disputes decisively. International aid and external military intervention from the international community often perpetuate such conflicts. And the Cold War further exacerbated the problem by inducing the superpowers to provide large amounts of military aid. The continual infusion of weapons and resources can prolong such wars indefinitely. This timely book offers an entirely new way to look at recent vicious civil wars, failed states, and the terrorist movements that emerge in their wake.'

Chapter III is given over to an examination of the causes and consequences of state failure and the grounds for the international community to combat such failure. Chapter IV deals with the non-military instruments that can be deployed. Chapter V describes on what grounds military instruments can be lawfully deployed and in what circumstances they can be deployed most efficiently. Chapter VI examines past experience of rescuing failed and failing states. Chapter VII contains a proposal for greater involvement of the UN. Finally, Chapter VIII gives a brief summary and sets out some general policy conclusions. Specific recommendations are given at the end of each of the relevant chapters.'

'Since 1990, more than 10 million people have been killed in the civil wars of failed states, and hundreds of millions more have been deprived of fundamental rights. The threat of terrorism has only heightened the problem posed by failed states. This is the first book to examine how and why states decay and what, if anything, can be done to prevent them from collapsing. It defines and categorizes strong, weak, failing, and collapsed nation-states according to political, social, and economic criteria. And it offers a comprehensive recipe for their reconstruction. The book comprises fourteen essays by leading scholars and practitioners who help structure this disparate field of research, provide useful empirical descriptions, and offer policy recommendations. The editor's substantial opening chapter sets out a theory and taxonomy of state failure. It is followed by two sets of chapters, the first on the nature and correlates of failure, the second on methods of preventing state failure and reconstructing those states that do fail. Economic jump-starting, legal refurbishing, elections, the demobilizing of ex-combatants, and civil society are among the many topics discussed.'
'Close analysis of how non-state actors adapt to state collapse is critical for effective peacebuilding, development, and counter-terrorism strategies in those crises. In Somalia, the nature of state collapse has changed significantly since 1995. Armed conflict is more localised; lawlessness is better contained by local authorities; and warlords have been weakened by an emerging commercial elite whose interests lie in stability, not plunder. Risk-aversion drives political behavior and partially explains the reluctance of local elites to support a revived central government. Somalia, to date, has not been particularly attractive as a safe haven for terrorists due to the risk of betrayal and extortion foreigners face there. Instead, terrorist networks have used Somalia principally as a short-term transshipment site into Kenya. Efforts to revive a central state in Somalia risk creating a 'paper state' - one which lacks a capacity to govern and is prone to police corruption, providing an environment in which terrorist networks thrive.'

'The threat of terror has given the problem of failed states an unprecedented immediacy and importance. In the past, failure had a primarily humanitarian dimension, with fewer implications for peace and security. Now nation-states that fail, or may do so, pose dangers to themselves, to their neighbors, and to people around the globe. The contributors to this volume develop an innovative theory of state failure that classifies and categorizes states along a continuum from weak to failed to collapsed.'

Postconflict Reconstruction in Africa : Flawed Ideas about Failed States.
Author(s):
1. Englebert, Pierre

Subject(s):
1. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION--AFRICA
2. FAILED STATES--AFRICA
Notes:
Postconflict state reconstruction has become a priority of donors in Africa. Yet, externally sponsored reconstruction efforts have met with limited achievements in the region. This partly due to three flawed assumptions on which reconstruction efforts are predicated. The first is that Western state institutions can be transferred to Africa. The poor record of past external efforts to construct and reshape African political and economical institutions casts doubts on overly ambitious objectives of failed state reconstruction. The second flawed assumption is the mistaken belief in a shared understanding by donors and African leaders of failure and reconstruction. Donors typically misread the nature of African politics. For local elites, reconstruction is the continuation of war and competition for resources by new means. Thus their strategies are often inimical to the building of strong public institutions. The third flawed assumption is that donors are capable of rebuilding African states. Their ambitious goals are inconsistent with their financial, military, and symbolic means. Yet, African societies are capable of recovery, as Somaliland and Uganda illustrate. Encouraging indigenous state formation efforts and constructive bargaining between social forces and governments might prove a more fruitful approach for donors to the problem of Africa's failed states.

Weak States, State Failure, and Terrorism.

Author(s):
1. Newman, Edward

Subject(s):
1. TERRORISM
2. FAILED STATES

Notes:
It is common to hear the assertion that weak or failed states are fertile ground for terrorism. Yet terrorist groups have emerged from, and operated within, countries which have strong, stable states and a variety of systems of government. Terrorist organizations operate in weak and failed states but it is not necessarily the condition of weak or failed statehood which explains their presence. Moreover, it is not necessarily the weakest states which do host such groups. Therefore, this condition is not a sufficient explanation for their presence. While weak or failed states might provide an enabling environment for certain types of terrorist groups to operate, additional explanatory variables need to be identified.

Inducing a Failed State in Palestine.

1. Sayigh, Yezid

Subject(s):
1. ARAB-ISRAELI CONFLICT
2. PALESTINE--POLITICS AND GOVERNMENT
3. FAILED STATES--PALESTINE

Notes:
The policies of the Quartet of the United States, the UN, the EU and Russia have contributed materially to systemic, probably irreversible collapse - 'state failure' - in the Palestinian Authority. The Hamas takeover of Gaza in June 2007 underlined the consequences of applying sweeping, punitive sanctions against an entity and a population already exhibiting signs of severe political, social and economic stress. The risk is that this approach will polarise Palestinian politics even further, expanding the scope and scale of internecine violence. If Hamas is brought down in the Gaza Strip neither the Palestinian Authority emergency government nor the government of Israel would be able genuinely to govern the area. But the alternative is that Hamas will succeed in consolidating its power in Gaza. A resumption of external trade or even a ceasefire agreement may allow a power-sharing deal to be reached once more with Fatah, but will not endure in the absence of a diplomatic initiative that reinstates firm benchmarks and detailed goalposts for the two-state solution. This is unlikely as long as the international community will not engage in forceful political intervention. The fact that the Quartet confined the mandate of its new special envoy, former UK Prime Minister Tony Blair, to assisting Palestinian political and economic reform suggests that it has opted for the default choice of persevering in a failed policy.

Reconstructing Weak and Failed States.
Author(s):
   1. Coyne, Christopher J.
Subject(s):
   1. POSTWAR RECONSTRUCTION
   2. DEMOCRATIZATION
   3. FAILED STATES
Notes:
   It is argued that the process of reconstructing weak and failed states along liberal democratic lines is a cultural rather than a merely technical issue. The work of Alexis de Tocqueville provides key insights into the foundations of liberal democracy and the limitations on the ability of foreign countries to export liberal democratic institutions via military occupation and reconstruction. After considering these insights, the implications for reconstruction efforts are considered.

Subject(s):
   1. NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Notes:
   In postulating a collapse of a nuclear-armed state, two key questions arise. First, what can be done about the nuclear weapons and related materials and technologies themselves in such a situation? And second, assuming the answer to the first question is not encouraging, what military options exist for a brute-force operation to restore order and stability countrywide in the hope that doing so will ultimately allow dangerous nuclear capabilities to be located and secured?

Neotrusteeship and the Problem of Weak States.
(International Security, vol. 28, no. 4, Spring 2004, p. 5-43.)
Author(s):
1. Fearon, James D.
2. Laitin, David D.
Subject(s):
1. Nation-Building
2. Failed States
Notes:
As recent efforts in Bosnia, East Timor, Sierra Leone, Afghanistan, and now Iraq attest, state building has become a growth industry. Even the Bush administration, once highly resistant to US involvement in such missions, is now willing to engage in state-building projects based on the recognition that failed states and rogue regimes seeking weapons of mass destruction post the main security threats to the international community. The authors examine several cases in which major powers and international institutions have sought to prop up or rebuild a weak or collapsed state. Concluding that "the international system remains badly organized and badly served for dealing with the implications of state collapse", the authors propose a system of neotrusteeship to facilitate coordination of future state-building activities.

Sharing Sovereignty: New Institutions for Collapsed and Failing States.
Author(s):
1. Krasner, Stephen D.
Subject(s):
1. Failed States
2. Sovereignty
Notes:
The two principal policy tools for addressing the problems of failing and collapsed states - governance assistance and transitional administration - are woefully inadequate, argues the author. Part of the problem involves the limitations of conventional sovereignty. "Recognition of juridically independent territorial entities and nonintervention in the internal affairs of other states no longer work" in the case of collapsed and poorly governed countries. Indeed, the basic rules of conventional sovereignty may contribute to their problems. The author calls for the creation of two new institutions - de facto trusteeships and shared sovereignty arrangements with regional and international organizations or, in some cases, more powerful and better governed states - to help improve governance in these countries.

Een multilaterale aanpak van het probleem van de 'falende staten'.

Author(s):
1. Peters, Paul
2. Schrijver, Nico

Subject(s):
1. FAILED STATES

Notes:
The authors address the issue of 'failed states' which in recent years emerged as a new international concern. In their view failed states are first of all characterized by the loss of the monopoly on the use of force within their territory. Upon a review of the various causes why states may fail and collapse, they point out the reasons why failed states should be considered a matter of global responsibility. The authors advocate a multifaceted multilateral strategy and the strengthening of the United Nations system in managing, restoring and, if possible, preventing the failure of states. Their proposals include the establishment of a new Centre for Governance Assistance of the UN Secretariat and of a new Standing Committee on UN Administration and Governance Assistance of the UN Security Council for purposes of pooling experience and resources.

Notes:
The Bush administration has spoken about the dangers posed by failed and failing states, but is has not made fixing these trouble spots a top priority, concentrating instead on rogues and weapons of mass destruction. This error will undermine the administration's broader objective of making the world a safer place. Washington must develop a coherent and committed strategy to prevent and contain state failure. Unless it does, the United States will soon face a new set of global challenges and be overwhelmed.

When states are failing, when basic state functions are no longer carried out, and when people have no security, humanitarian crises erupt. In confronting this problem, the stronger states have followed an ad hoc policy of intervention and aid. In some cases, humanitarian disasters have resulted from inaction. Often, the media are blamed. Politicians complain about the media when they interfere (the CNN effect) and when they do not. This article looks at how the media do cover failing states. Sierra Leone and Congo are used as examples. The analysis shows that there is little independent coverage. A Danish survey of newsrooms shows that the national world-view and prevalent news criteria prevent consistent coverage. It is argued that politicians are the ones who determine national agendas: it is from political initiatives, rather than media coverage, that failing states and humanitarian crises can expect action.
